Can it be possible, Mr. Chairman, that we must be forever forced to issue bonds and incur indebtedness to maintain the stability of the currency of this Government? This bill offers this and nothing more. What is the meaning of all the platforms that have been enacted in this country and the declarations in which we pledged ourselves to a sound and stable currency and financial system? Let me ask the gentlemen on the other side, what do you mean when you say that you want a sound financial system?

If I understand you correctly, if I understand the intent and meaning of your platform declarations and that of the Democratic party, it is that we want a system of finance in which gold, silver, and paper money of all characters shall circulate on a basis of parity and equality throughout the Government, every dollar being equal to every other dollar; a complete, self-supporting, and fixed system, to exist without imposing the burdens of a bonded indebtedness on the people to maintain it. If this be true, the bill fails to accomplish the purpose. It weakens the present erroneous financial system so far as the public interest is concerned. It brings the Republic as an humble suppliant at the feet of its bondholders and its national banks. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I was greatly interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY]. He was exceedingly liberal in the discussion of the monetary question and especially in his opinions regarding the ratio. I was particularly interested in watching him tear the halo off the ratio of 16 to 1 and to hear his declaration that he was not wedded by any means to the Chicago platform of 1896. I confess that I might have been more surprised had he not been one of many of the gentlemen from the other side of the Chamber who have in this debate showed their want of respect for the ratio fixed by the Chicago convention.

Indeed, it has been the exception in the course of one week's debate for the members upon the opposite side of this House to reassert their fealty to the ratio of 16 to 1. For the most part they have been silent upon that subject, when the very first section of this bill makes the question of the standard, and hence the ratio, to be adopted the most important subject before the House in the discussion of this bill. The gentleman from Kentucky asserts that he is not only not wedded to the Chicago platform of 1896, but proposes to wait for the declaration of the Democratic party in the next national convention of 1900, and proposes to stand on that, whatever it may be.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that the American people are not to be trifled with in the consideration of the fundamental question that is before us, by the shifting attitude which they propose to occupy themselves in these matters. I am here this afternoon not for the purpose of adding to the information which has already been given as to the provisions of the bill so much as I am here to emphasize my distinct approval of every one of these features. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I come from a district which prior to 1894 and for twenty years previous to that had given Democratic pluralities ranging from 1,500 to 2,500, before the time when there was any fusion existing between the Republicans and Democrats and when the Populist vote in the district was in the neighborhood of 1,500. The campaign of 1894 was won in my district because the people demanded another change from existing conditions prevailing at that time. The campaigns of 1896 and 1898 were made chiefly on the money question, and it is principally for that reason that the great body of the intelligent people of my district drifted away from their associations with the Democratic party and into the Republican party, because of their desire for sound money and better business conditions than existed at that time.

It becomes me, therefore, M. Chairman, not to be silent upon this question when we are called upon to make permanent the prosperous conditions that are now prevailing in the country by ingrafting into the law the provisions which are drafted in the impending bill. From the foundation of our Government changes in our coinage and currency laws have been made with the utmost caution and only from time to time as the immediate exigencies of business demanded, and our system has been the evolution of the logic of events in our history rather than the plan of any man or body of men in any era of our development, and sometimes misled by temporary depression to resort to some degree of fiatism.

Still every change made has been hedged by some cautionary limitations, showing the disposition upon the part of statesmen of all times to disturb existing conditions as little as possible by this class of legislation. Conservatism has left its mark on our financial legislation far more deeply than our public utterances on the subject. Financial legislation can not be the direct means of creating wealth. Its legitimate function is to facilitate the transaction of business demanding to be consummated. Bad financial laws may, however, prevent a prosperity otherwise assured.

A good financial system, if involving a too radical change, may cause a serious disturbance to existing conditions that would work disastrous results. Such a vital and delicate relation to our business does our financial legislation bear to our business world. We have learned a truth—that the Government can not make a profit for itself out of the coinage of dollars or the printing of notes. As long as the Government undertakes to bear the burden of maintaining the standard of our money it must be the source of some expense.

The issue of money does not create wealth or of itself make business. We have sometimes imagined it did both at times when business was temporarily and artificially stimulated by the issue of cheap money in large quantities, but ultimately we have had to pay the penalty in the reaction and return to normal conditions. These are no longer merely expert opinions found only in works on political economy, but are vital truths popularly understood by the masses of the American people and learned by them in the hard school of experience. An anomalous situation, indeed, has presented itself in this debate.

Both sides of this Chamber are congratulating the country on the improved industrial conditions since 1896; it is sometimes grudgingly admitted by our Democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber, but local pride and facts combined have prompted each Democratic member to claim that a more than proportionate share of prosperity has been awarded to his district, presumably because of his piety, as, according to his claims in this debate, such prosperity was produced by the combined efforts of "Providence, natural causes, and the increased production of gold." Would we have had this influx of gold, upon which they join us in congratulations, if we had the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1? Ah, no! What proportion of credit is to be awarded each I do not know. From which conclusion, however, it logically follows that the Chicago platform is to be amended at least in one respect, and that is to give at least some slight recognition of Providence.

Some new scientific and political truths are to be promulgated by our friends of the other side: The way to add is to subtract; the way to multiply is to divide, and the way to continue a desirable business prosperity is to alter the political conditions and change the governmental policies under which that prosperity came and continued—to turn out the party which performs and put in the party which promises. If the people recognized the truth that the standard of our money should be based upon the bullion value of the metal constituting it and that there could not be concurrent circulation of two kinds of ultimate redemption money, excepting so long as the legal ratio was the same as the ratio of the bullion value of the respective coins, in the trying times of 1896, when the great end desired by all was to change the business conditions, how can it be expected in the next political battle of 1900 that they shall ignore these truths when the universal demand is that the present improved and improving conditions shall be preserved?

I never made a campaign in my life in which I did not give credit to the masses of the Democratic party for honesty and integrity of purpose. I believe if there ever was a campaign in all our history where both sides were equally honest and sincere it was in the campaign of 1896, where they started with little whirlpools of discussion on street corners, composed of two men in the morning and wound up with five hundred or six hundred in the evening.

The American people gave their best thoughts, as a whole, involving general study upon the subject of the monetary question in 1896, and I believe that their judgment at that time, carefully and honestly made, was final and final for many years. What excuse will be given for the failure of the prophecies of Mr. Bryan, upon the faith in which was honestly rested by his friends the gospel of disaster which the advent of McKinley and the gold standard was to produce? These prophecies were that we were to have, first, a constantly rising value of the dollar and a constantly downward tendency of the commodities which it purchased; second, a contraction of the volume of the currency, and third, a still more emphasized business depression and general idleness.

The challenge has repeatedly been made on the floor of this House by the Republican members for a denial from the other side of the failure of these prophecies. Yes, it has been demanded of the other side of the Chamber that the fulfillment of a single one of the prophecies be shown at this time. The only reply has been an admission of the failure in the general return of prosperity due, as claimed by them, to "Providence, natural causes, and the increased production and discovery of gold."

We Republicans do not object to being members of such an alliance and can, at least, say that no alibi can be established against us as a successful defense of the proposition that the Republican party is responsible for the present desirable conditions. We were there when the wondrous change took place. No candid man will claim that the direct cause of returning prosperity can be demonstrated like a problem in Euclid. Economic causes and effects are not so simple in their relations. Complex and various are, no doubt, the causes of the present splendid demand for the products of labor. Labor is employed. The conflict is not over employment, but wages. Agricultural products have an upward tendency. New manufacturing enterprises are being projected. Extension of loans is easily obtained. The volume of profitable American enterprises has burst the bounds of our own Republic and gone out upon the seas. We read in the Good Book that there was a man who had been blind from his birth who went to the Master, and He touched the man's eyes and restored his sight. The man who had been restored returned to his friends, and his friends got into a discussion among themselves as to whether the Master who had performed the cure was divine or not, and they turned to the man, and he said: "Whether He be a divine or no I know not; one thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see."

The people of this country will not disassociate and can not separate the administration of the Republican party from the present condition; and these conditions are not peculiar to any avenue of life, but are gradually spreading into every field of effort. I do not believe that the primary cause for this condition is the inauguration of the war and the victories and prestige which came to us as a result of it. The war has undoubtedly contributed to our commercial prestige by reason of the brilliant achievements on land and sea of our Army and Navy; but we have gone out with a sound public credit and have sought to do business with foreign nations upon the basis that we propose to demand the best money in the world and propose to obligate ourselves to pay the best money in the world.

There never was a time in the history of this country when there were as many thousands of people as there are now who do not classify themselves with any one political party. The campaign of 1896 was decided, not by partisans, but by patriots, and the result turned largely upon the vote of the independents, or men who had formerly not affiliated with the Republican party. There was a time when we could rally the people around a partisan standard for the sake of the name and traditions of the party; but even the Republican party, with its splendid achievements of the past, can not hope to win in the coming campaign of 1900 upon any other assurance than that we are able to preserve the existing conditions.

The statement of the gentleman from Kentucky that he proposes to abide by the next national Democratic platform, no matter what that may be, has excited the admiration of his colleagues, but it is not the present spirit in which the voters of this country propose to act, I apprehend, in the coming campaign. His position reminds me of a little story about a couple of gentlemen who were rival aspirants to the legislature in a backwoods county. They were of the same political faith and were upon the same platform, advocating their particular claims, and the question came up as to whether they would submit their differences to the party caucus. One of them, while making a speech advocating his own cause, was asked if he was willing to abide by the decision of the caucus and whether he was in favor of a caucus. He did not seem to comprehend what was meant by a caucus, but he was quite clear as to his position, for he said: "If the caucus is for me and my friends, then me and my friends are for the caucus; but if the caucus is agen me and my friends, then me and my friends are agen the caucus." [Laughter.]

The issues of 1900, which are before us in this debate very largely, can not be dealt with thus flippantly. They involve all the best interests of the country. We owe the people of the United States something more than a safe administration founded on correct financial principles. We owe them the duty of ingrafting these principles in the law. We owe it as a matter of party faith. We owe it to fulfill the promise of the St. Louis platform that the existing standard shall be preserved. We owe it by the State platforms of the Republican party promulgated since that campaign, and by the public papers and utterances of the President of the United States. But we owe it by a greater obligation to the people of the United States that an assurance may be given that there shall be no disturbances of existing conditions by another prolonged uncertainty as to our currency and the standard.

We propose to give to the men who intend to project new enterprises the assurance that they may rest secure in the stipulated value of the currency until the Senate shall again become Democratic, which can not be for a space of eight years. That is a practical assurance which is of appreciable value to men who propose to have confidence enough to go out into the domain of the unknown and untried and invest their savings and earnings in new and novel enterprises, and so, I say, at the same time that it is the part of honor, the part of expediency, the part of party faith, and the part of business sagacity for us to pass this law just as it is.

I am glad that it is not sought to go into the domain of creating a new currency scheme and placing our currency upon a different basis; not that a better scheme might not be created, but because of the uncertainty of its operation, of the desire to have no serious disturbance to a condition which now meets every reasonable demand. It was much safer for the committee charged with that duty to give us a bill incorporating every essential promise and guaranty which the party had made, incorporated every essential which was necessary to give the people of the country who employed labor and launched new enterprises a feeling of security in the stability and the safety of the future. It is a most auspicious time for us to place our currency upon a sound basis by law, as it is now in fact. As shown by the report of the committee which formulated this bill, the following facts appear:

The net gold in the Treasury on the 2d day of October, 1899, was $254,328,820. There is more gold in the United States now than ever before. The world's product of gold in 1898 was the greatest in history, and exceeded the product of 1897 by $48,616,000, and of 1896 by $85,177,000. The product of gold from the mines in the United States in 1898 was the greatest in the history of the country, exceeding the product of 1897 by $7,100,000, and of 1896 by $11,375,000. The output of gold, both of the world's product and the product from American mines, has increased annually since 1890. The output of silver for the same period has varied in different years, but its value per ounce has had a uniform tendency downward, declining to 60 cents per ounce in 1898, its lowest register.

The present conditions are most favorable and the time most opportune for the clear and unequivocal adoption of the gold standard. Prior to the year 1890 the gold standard had been legally adopted by the following countries, viz: Austria-Hungary, Brazil, British Honduras, Chile, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, Germany, Great Britain, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, and Turkey, and since 1890 the gold standard has been adopted by Costa Rica, Japan, Peru, and Russia. The coinage of silver on private account was suspended (prior to 1890) by the United States, Belgium, France, Holland, Italy, Spain, India, Switzerland, Greece, and Venezuela, thus effectually, although not absolutely fixing their status as gold-standard countries.

While we have been for many years, and are now, upon the gold standard, yet the bill first provides that "the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle." Thus we have the matter placed beyond cavil. The bill, then, does not disturb the legal-tender qualities provided by existing law of the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national-bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between the national banks.

The bill provides for a separate division of issue and redemption, to which is assigned all records and accounts relating to the issue, redemption, and exchange of the several kinds of United States money. There is now no provision, except most indirectly, for the minimum amount of reserved fund by existing law. The pending bill provides that the minimum amount of gold coin and bullion to constitute a reserve fund shall be equal to 25 per cent of the amounts, both of United States notes and Treasury notes, issued under the act of July 14, 1890, outstanding. There is a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds payable in gold coin, at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin, at the option of the United States, after one year, for the purpose of maintaining the gold reserve when necessary.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to use the reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the United States, and authorizes the Secretary, at any time that he may deem necessary to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, at his discretion to exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States, meaning by this to include the silver dollar and silver certificates. This provision, however, as at present in the bill, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to do so in his discretion and only when necessary.

The bill directs that all the United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, presented for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin at the will of the holder, but that silver certificates presented for redemption shall be redeemed in accordance with the existing law. It also provides that the notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held and constitute a part of said redemption fund, and shall not be withdrawn therefrom or disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes or certificates were exchanged or redeemed, except as otherwise provided in the bill; and it is further provided in the bill in that connection that a transfer may be made, or exchange of currency from the redemption fund to the general fund, and in that way under the provisions of the bill, but in no other way, can the provision concerning the paying out of notes or certificates once redeemed for other than the same coin be accomplished.

The bill repeals the limit heretofore existing of $50,000,000 as the maximum of subsidiary coin and fractional currency. So great has been the demand for additional subsidiary coin and fractional currency that the issue has been increased regardless of the law, and on September 30, 1899, the amount of this species of money exceeded the lawful limit by $16,523,333. The United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, hereafter issued or reissued, shall be of such denominations, not less than $1, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and silver certificates hereafter issued are to be only in denominations of $1, $2, and $5.

These provisions of the bill are to meet the demands of the so-called "pocket trade" of the country and to render more difficult the collection of these bills, for the purpose of seeking to embarrass the Treasury of the United States by their presentation for redemption in large quantities. Existing law with regard to national-bank notes provides for the allowance of issue of only 90 per cent of the par value of the bonds deposited for their security. This bill permits the national banks to issue their notes to the full par value of the bonds so deposited, and removes the tax upon the circulation of national banks, and seeks to equalize it by placing a tax of 1 per cent upon the value of their franchises as measured by the aggregate amount of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits.

This, it is hoped, will induce a large number of national banks, who have not thought it profitable to take advantage of their authority to issue notes, to take advantage of the provisions of the bill and give to the people an increase of the volume of the currency without any deterioration in its safety. The bill also permits national banks with $25,000 capital to organize in towns of 2,000 population, thus extending banking facilities to small towns. Armed with this record and with the practical results of our legislation before the people of the United States, we may safely approach the next great political conflict in 1900. [Applause.]

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly my inability to be in accord with what appears to be the prevailing opinion of my associates on this side of the House, sentiments which have been voiced by so many of the distinguished and learned gentlemen who upon this floor represent Democratic constituencies. But if I read aright the history of my party and the history of my country, my associates this day on the currency question do not express or reflect the true and patriotic sentiment of that party which has been written in indelible letters upon every page of its glorious history, through all these decades of its long, honorable, and patriotic career, namely, that the best currency, recognized as such the world over, was none too good for it. In this assertion I accept and reserve only the single instance of the great mistake of 1896, made, I confess, in the name and by a portion of that Democratic party which Jefferson founded, Jackson defended, and the illustrious Russell, of Massachusetts, sought to protect, even at the sacrifice of life itself.

Mr. Chairman, I believe if the single question of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 could be submitted to the Democratic voters of this country unconnected with any illustrious name or personality and free from all other political questions or suggestions, they would declare against it by an overwhelming majority. Further, Mr. Chairman, I believe the time has come—yes, and is long past—when the financial interests, the industrial interests, and the general business interests of this country should be relieved from this continuous and ever-present agitation of the silver question, which, at least for the past eight years, has been a greater menace and a greater injury to financial enterprises than all other things combined, hanging like a funeral pall over the general business prosperity of this country. These interests are looking to us this hour for a final adjustment and settlement of this question, that they may not be forever disturbed by this "endless chain" of currency talk and currency agitation. The country knows that if this bill becomes the law of the land now, in all human probability it will remain the law for at least six years to come; and if for six years, I have such confidence in the practical workings of the gold standard for the good of the country that it will thereafter stand for all time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it ill becomes our friends across the aisle to take to themselves too much credit for the establishment of the gold standard at this time. The Republican party would never have dared to present this bill had not that little band of Democrats at Indianapolis in 1896 exhibiting a spirit of self-sacrifice never before witnessed in this Republic in times of peace, boldly and patriotically declared in convention assembled for the single gold standard, to the end that the glory and honor of the true and honest dollar of the fathers should not perish in our midst, but should be upheld and defended by the humble followers of the great founders of our political party, and this stand was taken at a time when the Republican party was consorting and coquetting with the pale-faced goddess of the silver mines, who, with her sweet voice and silver tongue, was entrancing many a doubting Thomas on the other side of this House, those being most susceptible to the winning ways of this charmer who came from districts which had been inoculated with the silver virus. If an avenging God should place the mark of Cain upon the forehead of every Republican who has openly espoused the silver cause, or, what is, in my opinion, worse still, secretly given aid and comfort to the silver goddess, many a gentleman on the other side of this House who this day seems so much at ease among his newly acquired friends on the monetary question would not dare at this moment to raise his hat above his brow.

And, sir, I am proud to know and to realize that the seed which a portion of the Democratic party sowed in 1896 took root, grew, and fructified for a glorious harvest, and that the party this day in power thereby has learned something, and, seeing the error of its ways, has become emboldened to cut from the cover and appear in the open, influenced in large measure thereto by the declaration for the single gold standard so boldly announced in 1896 by the little band of Democratic patriots whose influence has permeated the whole body politic on this question to such an extent that it is now deemed safe by the Republican party to accept and announce this Democratic doctrine, and with monumental assumption, so far as history will permit, to appropriate to itself exclusively the honor of establishing the gold standard.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man my allegiance to the principles and traditions of the Democratic party. I have been a Democrat all my life and my progenitors for three generations kept the faith, and I have been a Democrat in a State and in a county where it costs something and means something to be a consistent Democrat. We, through evil and good report, have kept the faith, and with each returning election have set the beacon light on the watchtowers of the old party, and it seems that some of the stragglers and skeddaddlers from the honest-money fold have been attracted by their lights and now that the shot and shell are heard no more, or, if heard at all, in the dim distance, out of range, are returning from their wandering to join those who have held the fort and borne the burden in the heat of the day. Of course I understand that they come at the eleventh hour, but they shall have their reward.

Again, I can not consider it a part of my duty to oppose a measure which is in direct line with my own views of all that is just and right, and is destined to confer a lasting benefit upon the country, simply because it is introduced and supported by gentlemen representing the Republican party.

These are some of the considerations, briefly and imperfectly stated, which control my actions; and entertaining these views, I should be false to myself, false to the traditions of my party, and false to the best interests of my country did I fail to support this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, if there is no other gentleman who desires to address the committee, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 1 and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. FARIS, will act as Speaker during the evening session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Wednesday, the 30th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, January 3, 1900.

Also:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report proper, 500 copies of the report of the assistant inspector general on the State homes, and 150 copies of the record of members for the use of the Home.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to have a detailed examination made by the actual removal of the rock at the narrowest part of East River on the eastern side, at Ravenswood, Long Island, New York, at and near Ramey's cofferdam, for a distance of 1,200 to 1,500 feet, with a view to widening and deepening the channel at that part of the river to 600 feet of width and at least 15 feet of depth, with also an examination and estimate of cost for the whole work, including deepening the channel to 25 feet at mean low water. The expenses incurred in pursuance of this resolution shall be defrayed from the balances available from previous appropriations for the improvement of the East River.

Also:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Bureau of American Republics 2,500 copies of the Annual Report of the Director of the Bureau of American Republics.

Also:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to print, in excess of 1,000 copies authorized by the act of January 12, 1895, 5,000 copies of the annual report of Maj. Gen. E. S. Otis, United States Volunteers, commanding the Department of the Pacific and Eighth Army Corps, and military governor in the Philippines, dated August 31, 1899, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

SALARIES OF CONGRESSIONAL OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES FOR DECEMBER.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following joint resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman suspend a moment? Mr. Speaker, the Senate has just sent over a concurrent resolution—

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will suspend, the gentleman from Rhode Island offers a resolution, which will be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1899, on the 19th day of said month.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1899, on the 19th day of said month.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution just reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

ANNUAL REPORT OF MAJ. GEN. E. S. OTIS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has just sent over a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of the report of General Otis. I ask that the resolution be read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report the resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to print in excess of the 1,000 copies authorized by the act of January 12, 1895, 5,000 copies of the annual report of Maj. Gen. E. S. Otis, United States Volunteers, commanding the Department of the Pacific and Eighth Army Corps, and military governor of the Philippines, dated August 31, 1899, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we may consider that resolution at the present time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman as to the necessity for any haste about printing this before the committees are appointed.

Mr. DALZELL. The necessity for haste, as I am informed from the Printing Office, or through the Senate from the Printing Office, arises from the fact that the type is now set and that these additional copies may be printed now at very little additional expense, whereas if we do not print them now the type will have to be reset and it will cost considerable money. It is in the interest of economy, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, as fixed by the special order, the House will be in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FARIS].

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House for the session this evening, the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will please take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 1, the financial bill.

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, the short time allotted to me in this discussion will not enable me to express myself fully upon the provisions of the bill now under consideration. This measure was introduced upon the first day of this session, and a special order has been made for its consideration which provides for a sufficient time only for a brief discussion of its provisions.

This bill enacted into a law will be a law placed upon the Federal statutes that is a departure from the old established policy that has been in vogue in this country since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. It is a material departure from that financial policy that was mapped out by the fathers and by those who laid the foundation for this great American Republic.

I desire to confine myself simply to the bill under consideration, and will therefore read the first and second sections. The first section is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

That part of section 2 to which I desire to call the attention of this House is as follows:

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that by section 1 the gold dollar is made the standard for unity value, and by section 2 all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and the Treasury notes shall be deemed and held to be payable in gold coin of the United States, and that all other obligations, both public and private, for the payment of money are to be performed in conformity with said second section, which means that they are to be paid in gold. These two sections of the bill show conclusively not only that it is a departure from the established and well-known policy of this Government, but it is antagonistic to the position that any great party has ever taken since the existence of this Republic. In and by this measure you are attempting to put the country absolutely on a gold basis in fact as well as in theory. You stand now committed to the policy of gold monometallism. In that memorable contest of 1896 you proclaimed that you were in favor of bimetalism to be brought about by international agreement. You as a party have now abandoned that position and declare yourselves as opposed to bimetalism in any form whatever.

When the present Administration came into power you were pledged to secure an international agreement for the coinage of silver, and a commission was appointed that traveled abroad to consult with the European nations concerning that subject; and it is charged that that was only a pretense upon the part of the Administration to carry out that pledge so adopted in the St. Louis platform. And as an evidence that the Administration was not sincere in this matter, it has been openly stated that while the commissioners so appointed were trying to secure such international agreement, the Secretary of the Treasury of this country was in a measure convincing foreign nations that were being consulted that it was only a pretense upon the part of the United States and not to be considered seriously by them.

Whilst you were pledged as a party to bring about legislation friendly to silver, you have, in fact, from the very day of the inauguration of the present Chief Executive, been flirting and courting with the money power and money interests of this country and gradually advancing to the position which you are now assuming.

You now claim that the country is demanding this character of legislation. From what source does it come? Does the demand come from the great mass of people who are engaged in agricultural pursuits? Does it come from that heroic and patriotic class of our citizens who are engaged in daily toil for the support of themselves and their families? Does it come from the citizenship of this country who are in moderate circumstances financially? My answer and my response is that it does not. If you have had a call from any source whatever, that call has been from that class who have amassed great fortunes to the detriment of others, and who are dictating the affairs of government and have been doing so for the last few years, and from all outward appearances are controlling the present Federal Administration. Ah, gentlemen, in my humble judgment you are simply carrying out the pledges heretofore made; you have changed your position so abruptly on this great financial question not at the request or demand of the great body of the people, but at the solicitation of the moneyed interests and those who reap fortunes through the labor and toil of others. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

By this bill you change the existing terms of the contract; you provide that all obligations, both public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in accordance with the provisions of this bill, which means that they shall be paid in gold and nothing but gold. You say to the people that all the contracts heretofore entered into shall now be paid in gold, whether that contract is a public obligation or private. You say that all contracts for the payment of money hereafter entered into shall be paid in gold, yet you know, and I know, that only a small part of the money with which the people do their business in this country is gold. If this is to be the law, you double the burden of the debtor class; instead of giving the debtor relief, you increase his burdens. By this legislation you are legislating in favor of the creditor class and in opposition to the debtor class, and when you proclaim upon the floor of this House that this legislation is demanded by the people of the United States you deceive yourselves, and I believe that you are deceiving your constituents, for your constituents are not demanding that the obligations into which they have heretofore entered shall be performed in any other manner other than by the terms of the obligation itself as entered into.

Mr. Chairman, these are not the only bad features of this bill. Its enactment into law, and its enforcement, means the withdrawal of the greenbacks, and that necessarily means a contraction of the currency. I find that the President in his recent message delivered to this House uses this language:

I repeat my former recommendations that a portion of the gold holdings shall be placed in a trust fund from which greenbacks shall be redeemed upon presentation, but when once redeemed shall not thereafter be paid out except for gold.

This is one way that the Republican party has for retiring the greenbacks, and the provisions of this bill are such that when the greenback is once redeemed it can not be paid out thereafter except for gold; and we all know what necessarily must follow, and that is, that it means an impounding of the greenbacks which are now circulating among the people to the amount of over $340,000,000. Nor does it stop there; but it also means an impounding of the Treasury certificates and the silver dollars that are now in circulation, with the power and privilege given to the national banks to take the place of the people's money.

You make the United States notes and the Treasury notes and, in fact, the silver dollars all redeemable in gold. You provide further by this bill such legislation that places the power in the hands of the national banks to control the volume of money. This is legislation that is unjust to the people. This is legislation that is not demanded by the great mass of the people; it is legislation in favor of a class and against the interests of the masses, and the enactment of this bill will, and should, defeat you before the people. You misjudge that patriotic and industrious class of citizens who are engaged in the various avocations of life to gain a livelihood, and who are the real wealth producers of the land, when you think that you can force this character of legislation upon them without their resenting it. They will resent it, and I will resent it for them. [Great applause.]

In section 4 I find this provision:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve fund taken upon the books of the division of issue and redemption, as herein provided, and for this purpose he may from time to time transfer to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or may exchange any of the funds in the division of issue and redemption for other funds which may be in the general fund of the Treasury, and in addition thereto he is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said reserve fund, bonds of the United States.

Here is unlimited power to issue bonds of the United States given to the Secretary of the Treasury. If this bill should become a law, it is so favorable to the great financial interests of this country that they could at any time within twenty-four hours force a bond issue; and by this section you are placing, without any restrictions whatever, upon the Secretary of the Treasury the right and authority at his discretion to issue bonds, and the Secretary of the Treasury is usually a man that is connected with the great banking institutions. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to placing this power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, giving him the right, without any limitations whatever, to place an indebtedness over the heads of the people of this nation. It is unjust. It is class legislation, because it is legislation in the interest of the favored few and against the rights of the common people.

You provide in this measure for the payment of the interest at well as the principal in gold of all the outstanding obligations and all those hereafter to be issued. At this time, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the interest-bearing bonded indebtedness of the United States is $1,046,000,000, all payable in coin, as that is now the terms of the obligation as the law exists to-day, but if this bill passes all these bonds will be payable in gold only, together with the interest thereon. And now, have you gentlemen occupying seats on that side of this Chamber stopped to think how much money by this legislation you are putting in the pockets of the bondholders?

When President Cleveland sold $62,000,000 in bonds, before doing so, in a special message to Congress, he said that if authority was given to sell gold bonds instead of coin bonds on the sale of the $62,000,000 of bonds there would be a gain of $16,000,000. And on the same basis the making of the interest-bearing bonded indebtedness of the United States payable in gold, as provided in this proposed legislation, will mean a gain to the bondholders of over $261,000,000, which follows that this great sum of money of over $261,000,000 is to be taken from the pockets of the people by this proposed legislation and presented to the bondholders. You gentlemen on the Republican side of this House who profess and proclaim your friendship for the rights and interest of the people are here proposing to vote away more than $261,000,000 of the people's money and gratuitously present it to the syndicate of bondholders and men who are only patriotic and have the interests and welfare of these United States at heart when they can plunder and bleed the nation.

How you can face your constituents and advocate a measure of this kind I am unable to understand. How you can vote and by so doing place upon the Federal statutes a law that not only takes from the people this vast sum of money heretofore mentioned but makes every obligation into which they may hereafter enter more burdensome and harder for them to meet and at the same time expect their support and respect I can not understand. You appear to be of the opinion that because you have the moneyed owners upon your side it is all you need. But I warn you, and warn you now, that I believe that the people of this country will rise up in their righteous indignation and sweep your party out of power for favoring this class of legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the influences that are instrumental in securing this legislation are the same forces and same influences that began a raid on the United States during the time of the war between the States. To be convinced of this fact it is only necessary to follow the history of the financial legislation from 1862 up to the present time. In February, 1862, the present greenback currency was created, and in this House at that time the bill passed making greenbacks a full legal tender. When this bill was presented to the Senate, a most formidable lobby, composed of the same class of people who are now clamoring for "national honor and public faith and public credit," were found knocking at the doors of the Senate, demanding an amendment to the bill as it passed the House. They wanted to insert this clause: "Except duties on imports and the interest on the public debt."

The bill was so amended in the Senate. By reason of this amendment the duties on imports and interest on the public debt necessarily had to be paid in gold. We were a great importing nation; money must be had to pay such imports; money must be had to pay the interest on the public debt. It could not be paid with the greenbacks by this amendment, and demand for gold was created. Speculators had cornered the gold, and in order to get the money with which to pay the interest on the public debt and the duties on imports we were compelled to apply to these men who had cornered gold for it. We all know the result. These men who held the gold demanded all the way from $2 to $2.85 in greenbacks for $1 in gold; these same men taking the greenbacks purchased with gold at less than 40 cents on the dollar, and with the same greenbacks so purchased bought Government bonds at the full face value of the greenback, so that the bonds cost the gold gamblers less than 40 cents on the dollar in gold. I think the exact cost was 35 cents on the dollar in gold. These speculators and plunderers of the General Government now held that the bonds of the United States were "payable in lawful money." They desired to score another point, since they held the bonds of the United States that had cost them not to exceed 35 cents on the dollar. They then went to Congress, which was controlled by the Republican party, and demanded further legislation by which they could be again benefited.

In 1869, after the war was over and they had thoroughly gotten control of the Republican party, they clamored for the passage of what was called the "public credit strengthening act." In that way that act was passed and became a law, by which act all of these bonds payable in lawful money were declared to be payable in coin, which meant either gold or silver. These plunderers were not yet satisfied; they were still seeking legislation. They now had a law that provided that the obligations should be paid in coin. However, that, they thought, might be repealed, and they were not willing to stop until they had the contract itself so read that the obligations of the Government were payable in coin.

In 1870, being afraid that the law of 1869 might be repealed, the same bondholders came and procured the passage of the "funding bill," which authorized them to have written in the face of the bond that it was payable in coin.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a part of the history of the financial legislation of this country; and when I say that the influences that are instrumental in securing this legislation are the same influences that began a raid upon the Treasury of the United States during the war between the States, I can refer to the history of the legislation upon this great question as abundance of evidence in proof of my assertion. Their appetites for greed sharpened with their success. Their schemes for spoliation were as yet incomplete, and three years after the refunding bill was adopted they procured the demonetization of silver, thus greatly enhancing the value of the holdings. These are the ghouls who feast and fatten off of the toils and burdens of others while they cry for "honesty and public faith and the sustaining of the national credit." This is the class who denounce the common people as anarchists and as villains, while they themselves are seeking to enact legislation that will enable them to violate the sacred contracts into which they have heretofore entered.

Now, a word to my Republican friends. If it was good to have the double standard heretofore—for you have placed yourselves upon record favoring it—what reason do you give upon the floor of this House or to the country that it is not good to have and sustain the money of the Constitution, gold and silver, at this time? There is not a man of you who has been in Congress for any considerable length of time but what has placed himself upon record in favor of both gold and silver as the basic money of this country. You have always maintained convictions to that effect until the assembling of your last national convention, in St. Louis, when that convention was controlled and dominated by the bondholders and bankers of the country.

In 1888 in your national convention you declared that—

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

This declaration of your party platform was written by the gentleman who is to-day the President of the United States. You were striking at the Cleveland Administration—and I am not here to defend the Cleveland Administration upon that question—and the truth is that the McKinley Administration is following in the footsteps so closely of the Cleveland Administration that no one can discern the difference.

Again, in the national Republican platform of 1892 you said:

The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as money.

What a change in the convictions of the leaders of this great party! Were you honest and sincere when you made these declarations to the people? If you were, what reason are you giving to the people of this country for your sudden change of heart?

Again, in 1890, in a speech in this House of Representatives, the present Chief Executive on this subject said:

I am for the largest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it; I would give it equal credit and honor with gold. I would make no discrimination. I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

These are only a few of the declarations that men high up in the affairs of the Republican party have made favorable to the use of gold and silver as the standard money of the land.

Yea, you have changed your convictions, gentlemen, because of the fact that your party has been taken charge of, body and soul, and is controlled by the wealth of the country. Before I would surrender my convictions to the money power, before I would misrepresent that proud and patriotic people who commissioned me as their Representative in Congress, I would resign my seat as a member of this House.

You may pass this bill through this House—and I suppose you will on Monday next, because you have brought in the party lash and have driven into line those members whose judgment dictated to them that they ought to stand by the principles and declarations enunciated by their party heretofore—but, as sure as you do, I want to say to you as an humble member of this House that when you go before the people of this country and this question is fairly presented to them that, notwithstanding all of the coercing of the corporations and the money changers, you will be swept out of power, and instead of you maintaining a majority upon the floor of this House you will be in the minority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that the Republican party is taking on British practices and British ideas.

The Republican party is standing for colonial colonization, for colonial possessions, and for that character of expansion that threatens the very foundations of the Republic itself, and takes on the appearances of an empire.

The Republican party is following in the footsteps of the British Empire on the financial question; you are in favor of adopting their monetary standard; you are following them in the suppression of human liberty, for now one of the most unrighteous and unholy wars is being waged by that Empire against a good and inoffensive people in the South African Republic.

You fail to sympathize with the Boers in the struggle for liberty in which they are now engaged. If you keep up at the rate you have been going, in a short time you will be in favor of an empire instead of a government with the power lodged in the hands of the people.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is going to be another hearing before the people. The line is now drawn, the gold monometallists upon the one side and all those who favor the money of the Constitution and of the fathers and the right of the people to rule upon the other.

In that contest at the head of the column will be the friend and champion of the rights of the people. He will be placed upon the declaration of principles enunciated at Chicago in 1896, with the declarations declaring against trusts, imperialism, and militarism, and in that contest we expect to elect that fearless and patriotic citizen, William Jennings Bryan, President of these United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is with a considerable degree of embarrassment that I stand before you this evening for the purpose of addressing this body for the ten minutes allotted to me with reference to the bill which is now pending for consideration.

I have heard, sir, the question of monopoly discussed in its various forms and phases during this discussion on the floor. I have heard monopoly condemned; I have heard monopoly censured and abused; and it seems to me that if there is anybody or any man who can take pride in monopoly at the present time it is a speaker on the floor of this House on this question, for a more perfect monopoly I have never seen in all of my experience. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe it to be my duty to the constituency whom I have the honor to represent on this floor to raise my voice, in common with the Democrats on this side of the Chamber, in opposition to the pending bill and to assert some reasons why I shall oppose it and why I shall cast my vote against it. And yet, sir, it is due to the country that there should be a fair, honest, and full discussion of the measure.

Why, then, do I oppose the bill? Because, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment it is a vicious measure and one which has no necessity back of it to authorize or warrant its enactment. I take as evidence of that fact the announcements and declarations made by gentlemen on the other side of the House themselves and the condition of the country which they say prevails to-day. We are told that there is a condition of universal prosperity. Why, then, seek to hamper it? I assume as evidence of the fact of that prosperity the declaration of the distinguished President of the United States who now occupies the White House, and will let him, in one of his public utterances, declare what is the condition of affairs now prevailing.

Let me read, sir, to you an extract from a speech made by Mr. McKinley at Vincennes, Ind., on the 11th day of October, 1899. He said then in part:

Our financial condition was never better than now. We have good money and plenty of it circulating as a medium of exchange. Banks may fail, fluctuations in prices come and go, but the money of the country remains always good, and when you have a dollar of it you know that dollar is worth 100 cents, because back of it is the Government of the States.

Not gold, as provided for in the pending bill; not the dollars taken from the hard earnings of the people, but because there is back of each dollar "the Government of the States," using the language of the President himself.

Further he says:

Not only have we prosperity, but we have patriotism, and what more do we want?

You have prosperity, you have patriotism, you have money circulating, every dollar of which is as good as any other dollar, and, Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen on the other side, What more do you want? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You say that the gold standard has been in force since 1834. If not since that time, then some of you claim that it has been in force since 1853. If it was not, then some of you say it has been since 1873, when, by legislative enactment, you were determined to make it so. And yet you come here with an anomalous proposition—a paradoxical proposition, one which can not be justified under the conditions which you say exist—and ask the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States to reenact a law which you claim is already in force and is now upon the statute books and of which the country can avail itself if it so desires. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I ask you, sir, what is the necessity for that? There must be something behind all this, and, in my opinion, it is in part to make provision for a depletion of the Treasury that must of necessity follow in the policy and practices of the Administration. It is not my purpose now, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the silver question, for I have not the time. I am not here to abuse men upon that side of the House for their views, but I am here, sir, in response to what I conscientiously and honestly believe to be right, and I am here to say that I believe this bill is opposed to the best interests of the whole people of this country. Why, sir, it absolutely retires from circulation a large part of the money of this country, every dollar of which is as good as gold, and substitutes for it a national banking currency, bought and purchased by the people and paid for in taxes imposed upon them. That money is to be retired, bound up in the vaults of the Treasury, or destroyed, as some gentlemen would have it, as suggested upon the other side, and its place taken by a currency issued upon taxation of the people for the purpose of maintaining the national banking system of this country. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but I am especially opposed to that provision of the bill which is in these words—section 4, referring to the reserve fund, says:

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve fund taken up on the books of the division of issue and redemption, as herein provided, and for this purpose he may from time to time transfer to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or may exchange any of the funds in the division of issue and redemption for other funds which may be in the general fund of the Treasury, and in addition thereto he is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said reserve fund, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per centum per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year.

I am opposed, sir, to this Congress vesting the power in one man to say what the legislation of this country shall be with reference to the further issue of bonds. The power of taxation is an extraordinary power. It is necessary in all governments, but it is a power that should never be delegated by the sovereign people to any one man to exercise for them. This Congress has upon several occasions refused to grant that power upon the request of the President of the United States, and I say now, sir, to vest that power of Congress in one man, to give him the authority in his discretion to say whether or not bonds shall be issued, to say whether or not a further burden shall be placed upon the people, to say whether or not additional interest shall be paid by them, is something that should not be surrendered by this representative body to any individual.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen upon the other side talk of prosperity. I am glad to meet them along that line. I say to you that the Democratic party, and I, as a member of that party, representing one of the proudest constituencies in this Union, representing, sir, I believe, the greatest agricultural district in the whole United States—I say to you that no people would welcome prosperity more than the Democratic party, or more than I as a representative of that party would welcome it. But, Mr. Chairman, if it be true that prosperity has come, if the farmers are thrifty, the manufacturers are prosperous, if the mining industries of this country are profitable, if every dollar of our currency is as good as every other dollar, if we are patriotic and if we have, in the language of the President, all that we want, I ask, why the necessity of this further legislation that places this great indebtedness upon the people of this country?

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to you that the farming interests of this country are the foundation of almost all its wealth. I want to say to you that prosperity has not come to them, according to the statistical report, as it has come to the manufacturing interests of this country. I want to say to you that the reports show that the exports of farm products of this country amount to 67 per cent of the total exports, and that there was a decrease of those exports in 1899 from those of 1898, and a relative decrease in the price per bushel of wheat grown by the farmers of this country in 1899 from that of 1898.

The prices of our great agricultural products are fixed by the price in the foreign market, and in that market there comes competition with the products of all the cheap labor of the world. Our home consumption of wheat and other products is drawn from a supply greatly in excess of the demand made by that consumption, so that we are compelled to find a foreign market in which to dispose of that surplus. The almost universal use of gold as the standard money throughout the world makes for it a demand by which its purchasing power is increased, and with the constantly increasing production that must necessarily follow from the opening up of the yet undeveloped great agricultural areas of the South and West there will inevitably come a decrease in the value of our products. If we are to adopt gold as the sole basis upon which the business of the country is to be conducted, we must procure a great portion of it from Europe, where we find a market for our surplus products, and by decreasing the volume of money, the value of our exported products would in the same ratio be decreased.

Mr. Chairman, this state of affairs is intensified by reason of the fact that by the tariff laws of this country we are precluded from exchanging our products for the manufactured products of those countries in which we are compelled to sell, where we could purchase much cheaper than here, and are compelled to purchase a large portion of the necessities of life with from 50 to 100 per cent or more added thereto in the way of protection to those industries, and thereby the interests of the agricultural classes, the great farming interests of the country, are taxed to pay tribute to the protected manufacturing interests.

Mr. Chairman, I see that my time is about expired. I know that this bill will pass, but, sir, from the action of this House we will appeal to the people, confidently believing that in their verdict we will find vindication of the justice of our opposition. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JETT. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, from a logical analysis of it, means not only a purpose to fix the gold standard as the unit of value, but it means to turn over to the national banks of this country the volume of the money to be used by the people.

I have listened very carefully to the speeches that have been made, both pro and con, upon this subject, and especially the speech made by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] who introduced the bill, and I must say that from his standpoint he made a masterly speech. I refer to his speech because under existing circumstances he had ample opportunity to present not only the bill in its entirety, but the reasons that actuated the committee in their preparation and presentation of it.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that I am unnecessarily, I will not say alarmed, but appalled. I can not support this measure. It provides:

That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

Section 2 of this bill provides:

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

This section changes all contracts now payable in coin, both public and private, and makes them payable in gold. This is a violation of every sense of right and justice.

Section 3 provides:

That there be established in the Treasury Department, as a part of the office of the Treasurer of the United States, a division to be designated and known as the division of issue and redemption, to which shall be assigned, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may approve, all records and accounts relating to the issue, redemption, and exchange, as hereinafter provided, of the several kinds of United States money.

I quote so much of said section as shows the true purpose of this bill, which has for its object the surrender of the issuance of the currency into the hands of the corporation herein created, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury and the national bankers.

Is there no confidence to be placed in the pledges of political platforms? This inquiry is pertinent when we remember that in 1892 the Democratic party nominated Mr. Cleveland for President and the people were led to believe from that platform that the reform of the tariff was the great panacea for all ills; and after the people had heard the discussion upon that proposition, the result was that Mr. Cleveland was elected President of these United States. As soon as he was elected he swapped thumbs and called a special session of Congress, not for the purpose of giving to the country a reform tariff bill, but for the purpose of repealing what was known as the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. During Mr. Cleveland's Administration, because of want of fidelity to the platform pledge that was made to the people, he succeeded in dividing the Democratic party into factions, and when he had served out his term we found the Democratic party throughout this country prostrate, bleeding from every pore from wounds inflicted by Mr. Cleveland and his associates.

In 1896 the Republican party made its platform, in which it declared for bimetalism through international agreement. The people listened to the arguments both pro and con, the Democratic party claiming that it would establish bimetalism alone without the aid of any country on the face of the earth. Mr. McKinley was elected. I will not undertake to discuss or to use any harsh language as to how he was elected, but he was elected on that question. What did he do? He swapped thumbs just as Mr. Cleveland did, and called a special session of Congress for the purpose of enacting a new tariff law, when that political monstrosity known as the Dingley tariff bill was born. May we not expect that history will again repeat itself next November?

Mr. Chairman, that was a bill that levied illegal and unjust tribute upon the people in the interest of the dominant class. It was an act of political piracy. It was an act that was wrong in principle and pernicious in practice. The gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, who are now the spokesmen of the Republican party, are not satisfied in deceiving the people by party platform pledges, but they dare to come here at the seat of their Government and boldly undertake to deceive them again by covering the true intent and purpose of this bill by calling it "A bill to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes," when in truth and in fact the object and purpose of it is to turn over to the national banks the control of the currency. Why do not they say what they mean and mean what they say?

Born in the light of liberty and the love of law, consecrated by the blood of patriots and christened by the fires of battles, this Government ought to be the proudest, the grandest, and the purest on the face of this earth. And it would be but for greed and avarice and partisan politics.

The introduction of this bill, which was framed amid the glittering seductions of Atlantic City, begins the last act in the tragedy of a nation's shame. It is the most remarkable and humiliating scene every witnessed upon the stage of history. The actors have thrown off the mask and robes of international bimetalism. They have fallen like whining cowards before the colossus of gold. The proposed bill is but another step in the iniquitous system by which the Republicans are stripping from the American people their most essential right, a system which will establish a new feudalism, without chivalry and without sentiment.

Again the lords of the realm will assume the powers of Government, the most sacred and fundamental of which is the issuance of the country's currency. It is an idea as old as Aristotle, yet true as the latest demonstrations of Edison, that a nation's money is a nation's blood, for money is the universal means by which a nation's labor is distributed in the various forms of bread and raiment and all the other necessities of human existence. Now, it is an unquestioned principle that the quantity of currency is an elemental factor in the regulation of all values. Hence the function of coining money and issuing currency is the most delicate and the most fundamental prerogative of popular sovereignty. Have the Republicans forgotten that all the powers of sovereignty emanate from the people? Do they deny that the coinage of money and the issuance of currency are among the essential and universal elements of sovereignty? Do they not understand that the Government at Washington is the only tangible expression of American sovereignty? Then why do they attempt to transfer the most basic element of Government from the mints to the millionaires? Why is it that they desire to change the seat of government from the buildings of the people to the banks of individuals? They would farm out the currency and place the money of the people under the control of individuals. As long as national banks retain the function of issuing money the dearest right and the most essential liberty of the American people will be desecrated and disgraced. The present bill extends the powers of national banks; it divorces entirely the functions of issuing currency from the Government and completes the scheme for the spoliation of the people.

This bill proposes under the cover to establish the gold standard, to perpetuate national banks as banks of issue, to surrender to the national banks and the Secretary of the Treasury complete control of the issuance of our currency, thereby creating by law a partnership between the Secretary of the Treasury and the wealthy few of our people. Not only this, but this bill, so far as it applies to national banks, is more objectionable than the present national banking law. I hope that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] and the other gentlemen who control this bill will place such restrictions upon the issue of national banks to the end that a bank once organized could not increase or diminish its notes. We are powerless under the rules to amend this bill or to offer a substitute.

As the law stands now those that are engaged in the national banking business can not withdraw all their notes from circulation. There are some restrictions which prevent them in a measure from contracting and inflating their notes at will. When this bill becomes a law, as it surely will, because the Republican party has the power to enact in into a law and its representatives are here for that purpose, the national banks will be clothed with so much power over the currency of this country that they will be enabled to create a financial panic within twenty-four hours should it suit their pleasure so to do. Knowing and believing this as I do, I can readily understand why it was that Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic party, said that national banks as banks of issue were more dangerous to the liberties of the people than large standing armies. I am not opposed to national bankers as individuals, because I know that there are many great and good men engaged in that business, but it is the power of issuing any kind of money, be it called credit money or whatever it may, that I oppose. It is a special privilege, a special power, given to them by law, which they ought not to exercise.

Section 4 of this bill reads as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve fund taken up on the books of the division of issue and redemption, as herein provided, and for this purpose he may from time to time transfer to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or may exchange any of the funds in the division of issue and redemption for other funds which may be in the general fund of the Treasury, and in addition thereto he is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said reserve fund, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year.

This is too much power to confide in any one man. Under the provisions of this bill the Secretary of the Treasury can issue one million or ten billions of bonds payable in gold, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of the reserve fund as provided by this act. This is unwise and unjust and dangerous legislation.

I want to say in conclusion that the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber seem to forget that bonds are chains; and chains are onerous and galling, notwithstanding they be chains of gold. I can hear the clanking of these gold chains as they are now being forged by the national banks in the East with which to bind us hand and foot, and you gentlemen are their henchmen to rivet them on both hands and feet of the American people. I stand up in my place and defy you to do your worst. There will come a time when the people will be able to rise up as one man and break these shackles from their limbs and set themselves free. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAM E. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would not attempt to discuss this question in the brief time allotted to me if I did not feel that it was a matter of great importance to my constituents as well as to the public at large. I do not say this complainingly, for I know that new members are not entitled to the privileges accorded to those of long service and that in the discussion of all questions those members long in service in this House have a decided advantage over those of less experience. I fully appreciate the recognition shown me and will avail of my time to the best advantage.

I feel that this bill is fraught with more of weal or woe for mankind than any legislation that has been proposed in a third of a century. It has already been suggested in this debate many times that no party has ever previous to this time declared in favor of the gold standard. In 1896 the Democratic party declared in favor of independent bimetalism; the Republican party declared in favor of international bimetalism; the Populist party and the Silver party for independent bimetalism. The only party which ever declared openly for a gold standard was that little handful of so-called Democrats that met at Indianapolis, the home of the progenitor of this bill, and nominated that ancient and acrobatic statesman of Illinois, John M. Palmer, for the Presidency. [Laughter and applause.] Not only has no party declared for it, but at no time in the history of this country or of the world has any people been called upon to approve or indorse or to graft upon themselves a gold standard.

The purpose of this bill is to fasten and rivet the gold standard upon us without the sanction of the people, and then, next year, before its evil effects fully manifest themselves and are realized in all their dire consequences, ask an approval and ratification by the people at the polls. It was attempted in 1875 to adopt the gold standard without discussion, when, in pursuance of an European conspiracy, a bill was smuggled through Congress and the approval of the President secured without his knowledge of the contents of the bill, and now, in line with the same reprehensible conduct, and characteristic of the same party that enacted that law, we find this bill attempted in almost the same way. There was no demand arising from the people, no platform declarations in the Congressional election of any party last year, no warning and no notice to the public, and yet a self-constituted committee met at Atlantic City, where they held conference with the presidents of banks and banking syndicates and drafted this bill in accordance with the exactions of the men who furnished the Republican campaign fund three years ago.

It then went into a secret vault and never saw the light of day until last week, when it was presented to the consideration of this House without having been published to the country for the consideration, approval, or criticism of the people. They not only introduced it in an informal manner, not referring it to any committee, as is the usual and customary and proper procedure, but they undertook by the operation of the Committee on Rules to deprive the representatives of the people from adequate preparation and the proper discussion of the question at any length on the floor of the House. They now ask to impose the law upon the people without opportunity for amendment here and without awaiting popular expression of resentment or approval, and before public sentiment can become aroused to the danger that is threatened and the weak-kneed, who have been corralled like so many cattle, can be influenced by the muttering of the coming storm to vote against it. [Applause.]

called upon to defend the Chicago platform, if any defense is necessary. I stand upon that platform and the party is committed to it, but this bill does not present the issues presented in the campaign of that year. Any patriotic American citizen, no matter whether he then favored independent or international bimetalism, no matter whether he voted for McKinley or Bryan, can consistently and ought to vote against this bill. When they say the question was discussed then, and that we ought to be prepared to meet it now, I reply to the gentlemen that the issues presented by this bill were not presented by the platforms adopted in 1896. We discussed bimetalism then, which was the creed of the Democratic party and the slogan of the Republican party. The Democratic party said, "We want independent bimetalism," and the Republican party said, "We want international bimetalism and pledge ourselves to promote it." We then warned the people from every stump that the pretensions of the Republican party in favor of bimetalism were not sincere, that they were hiding behind a mask, and that if McKinley should be elected the gold standard would be adopted and no good-faith effort made to promote international bimetalism, and we now point to this gratuitous and audacious attempt as proof of our predictions and a fulfillment of our prophecy. [Applause.]

One other point, Mr. Chairman, before presenting some of the objections which I wish to urge to this bill is the concession made by gentlemen upon the other side that the quantity of money in circulation has much to do with regulating prices. Why, it has been boasted by these gentlemen that since the election of 1896 and the inauguration of McKinley $385,000,000 has been added to the circulation, and they claim that prosperity is due in a measure to that increase of money, and that by reason of the increased production of gold the free coinage of silver becomes unnecessary. So much, then, for the quantitative theory of money, which I have not time to discuss within the limit assigned me. It is in effect conceded and eliminates much controversy and contention. [Applause.]

If prosperity has come, as is contended, it came under the same system and under the same financial policy that precipitated the panic of 1893. But let me say that whatever may be the improved condition of the times, they are traceable to other causes. The increased demand for the product of the farm and factory to equip and sustain large armies for the Spanish and Philippine wars, the conversion of 100,000 men from producers to consumers in the field, has produced a legitimate increase in the price of product and labor. Then, again, prices, in many instances, of the products of factories have been marked up by the great trusts and combinations formed and encouraged under the McKinley-Hanna Administration. I have not the time to discuss trusts here, but while passing wish to say they are the creatures of Republican class legislation. I fear that there is no real and abiding prosperity; that times have improved from temporary causes only.

I have no time to discuss that question now; but, Mr. Chairman, for the purposes of this argument I am willing to concede that there is a period of unusual prosperity prevailing, particularly in the moneyed and commercial centers and in other portions of the country which have been blessed by abundant harvests. If so, there is less reason for disturbing these conditions by a change in our financial policy. The motto "Let well enough alone" can be invoked with profit here. [Applause.]

Briefly stated, my reasons for opposing the bill are these:

First. It makes no provision for the coinage of the silver dollar, and, as I understand the law, since the repeal of the Sherman Act there is no provision for the coinage of the silver dollar in any existing law, and no provision in the proposed law for its coinage except for the coinage of fractional or subsidiary coin, as already embodied in the existing law. [Applause.]

Silver by this bill becomes directly redeemable in gold and ceases to be basic money. Heretofore it has not been redeemable by law, and has constituted a part of the actual money of the country. We have had since 1878 an anomalous financial system—a kind of quasi bimetalism—and silver has never heretofore been wholly discarded as actual money or reduced to the rank of credit or token money until now, when it is contemplated by the provision of this bill to make it redeemable—even worse than that, it is proposed, and little or no attempt is made to disguise it, to redeem, retire, and drive out of existence the "dollar of our daddies." [Applause.] We rejoice with our friends across the aisle in the new discovery and increased production of gold—we are not hostile to the yellow metal—and if there should be an adequate production of gold for the use of the civilized world for the purposes of basic money there would be no demand for the use of silver as money, and we would yield our contention.

The mere fact that this bill authorizes increased issue of bank currency is of itself an admission that there is not gold enough to answer the demand for money. But with the whole world engaged in a mighty struggle for gold and issuing gold bonds to maintain a supply; with a war barely averted between England and Venezuela only recently by reason of a British attempt to shift her boundary line to encompass and steal a gold mine from a country helpless without the intervention of a friendly nation; with a disputed Alaskan boundary line between our own country and the same avaricious nation by reason of the rich gold finds along the border; with a deplorable war now raging in the Transvaal between Boer and Britain, for which England can give but one excuse, and that a wicked design to seize and hold the reef of gold in that far-away country—rich beyond the dreams of avarice—for which she would blot out civilization forever and turn back the hands of time a hundred years; with such greed and such desperation, why should we strike down our own fair product and enter into the arena of conflict, into an unseemly and mercenary gold-grabbing scramble, with the other nations of the earth?

And, by the way, Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my disapprobation of England's attempt to subjugate that sturdy yeomanry, I rejoice in the Dutch victories, and, commingling my prayers with those of the dying martyrs and living heroes of that sunny land, I invoke the spirit of freedom, of devotion, and self-sacrifice, the love of country and home and fireside, the courage, the conviction, and the patriotism that inspired the fathers of our own Revolution, who struggled, endured, and died, with the same gold-fevered, merciless, and mercenary foe, for the freedom of our beloved, our native land. [Applause.]

Second. I object to the bill because it provides for the retirement of the greenbacks as well as the silver dollar and will operate to contract the currency to that extent. This is, no doubt, the object and purpose of the bill, but it was proclaimed the other day by some gentlemen on the floor, in the course of this discussion, that it will not have that effect, for the reason assigned that when the silver or greenback dollar is retired the gold dollar given out in exchange will go out to take the place of the retired dollar.

But, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen forget that that gold dollar in the first place was taken out of circulation; let me say, was extorted from the people; and the gold dollar which is paid out of the Treasury to redeem the silver or greenback dollar, as the case may be, may find its way, during the course of a day, back into the Treasury, ready to redeem another greenback or silver dollar, and so on from day to day, so that one dollar in the course of a year may redeem many hundreds of dollars, and in the course of time a small amount of gold can redeem every greenback and silver dollar outstanding and thus contract the volume of the currency to that extent. It is claimed that the silver and greenback may be paid out again for gold and in that way find their way back into circulation. But such is not the purpose of the bill, and I apprehend that the banks and financial sharks who horde and corner the gold and are, as we all know, unfriendly and inimical to silver and paper money will never give up a dollar in gold to redeem or to take out of hock a single greenback or silver dollar. Hence I say that when once redeemed the people's money will be consigned to its long home, to its final resting place, never again to come forth to cheer the hope, to gladden the heart, or to replenish the purse of the people. [Applause.]

Third. I object to the bill because it impairs the obligation of existing contracts in favor of the creditor and against the debtor, and makes a new obligation which has not heretofore been embodied in the contracts of the Government. It makes the bonds of the Government payable in gold coin, contrary to the express declaration which they bear upon their face. [Applause.] Congress refused to make the bonds when issued payable in gold coin, and they were placed upon the market with the full knowledge that they were payable in coin, gold or silver, at the option of the Government. It was represented by the bond speculators that the bonds could be floated at a much greater premium if made payable in gold, but Congress refused. They were sold on the basis of coin bonds, payable either in silver or gold, and at a profit to the holder, who now comes to the front to exact his pound of flesh in return for his campaign contribution and demands legislation for the payment of his bonds in gold, contrary to the letter, the spirit, and the intent of his contract. Mr. Chairman, such a demand is monstrous, and if enacted into law, if an indignant people do not rise up and visit retribution upon the offenders a just and righteous God will. [Applause.]

Fourth. It places a dangerous power in the hand of the Treasurer of the United States. That question has been already ably and logically discussed upon this floor. Mr. Chairman, it places more power in the hands of an individual than has ever been given a public officer since the Government of the United States began. The exclusive and absolute right to issue bonds at will is a dangerous power. It is a power that should never be intrusted to one person. It is a power that should be lodged solely in the Congress of the United States; in the hands of the people's representatives. [Applause.] Why this extraordinary delegation of power? Is it because Congress can not always—when Democratic—be relied upon to truckle to the demands of the money changers, the gilded magnates, and the bank trusts? Or is it because the Republican party, which was never known to betray a "trust," is faithfully keeping its pledges made to the money barons three years ago when such tremendous contributions were made to the Hanna corruption campaign fund? When this power is conferred the national banks, which can corner the gold at their own sweet will, and with full power to contract or expand the bank currency at the bidding of the bank trust, can drain the Treasury of gold, exhaust the reserve fund, and force an issue of bonds whenever it is desired to increase and multiply the national banks and extend their influence until their omnipotence is supreme and the people, bound hand and foot, become abject slaves, without remedy save that of revolution. [Applause.]

The fifth and last reason which I have time to specifically assign in opposition to this bill is that it creates a bank trust and places the issue and redemption and volume of our money helplessly in the hands and subject to the absolute control of the national banks. The power to issue money is a constitutional function of government and ought not and can not safely be delegated. Experience has taught us that banking institutions and financial concerns worship a mercenary god and are prompted in all their dealings by greed and avarice. Such a surrender of the people's birthright is a sad spectacle; it is pitiable indeed. The dire prophecy so often made is about to be fulfilled and the political fortunes of our country given over in abject and helpless submission to a band of conspirators—a lot of remorseless cormorants who have fed and fattened on the public and contributed of their ill-gotten gain to the corruption of public morals, to the seduction of the citizen voter, and to the destruction of those bulwarks of human liberty which vouchsafe free institutions, American manhood, American freedom, and American progress [applause], and now come with the audacity of his satanic majesty and exact merciless and extortionate compliance with the letter of their bond. The future alone can disclose the awful consequences of this iniquitous bill, for the responsibility of which I trust no Democrat will have to answer to his people or to his God. [Great applause.]

Gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber have expressed great solicitude for the future of the Democratic party, and have deluged us with prophetic warnings as to the consequences of our action here. Let me say to our friends across the aisle that they can better afford to concern themselves about their own political future. I warn them now if they pass this bill, if they fasten upon these people a gold standard without their authority and without their sanction, when the battle is fought and the victory won next November the news will go beyond hill and dale, across the prairies and the great father of waters, over the plains and the mountain peaks, around the world, announcing the glad tidings that the cause of Democracy has triumphed; that the will of the people is supreme. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. McLAIN. Mr. Chairman, in the very beginning of my remarks I wish to say that the extraordinary methods adopted by the party in power in forcing this bill upon the House, without even referring it to a committee, has thereby debarred me from giving that care and time upon the preparation of my remarks that this occasion demands. But I have not allowed considerations of this character to prevent me from giving public expressions on the floor of this House to my opposition to the pending bill. When one contemplates fairly and impartially this great question for us to decide, he is reminded that a great responsibility rests with him. I have the past few days listened with much pleasure to this great debate. I feel sure I can not throw any additional light upon it. But I owe it to myself and to my constituents to thus raise my voice against its passage.

Again and again this question under consideration has been discussed in this House on former occasions. From every stump in this land the best orators of our day have crossed swords upon this issue. It has been an issue in one of our Presidential campaigns, in which we as a party went down in defeat. But with all that, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who have not lost heart. Trusting in the supreme justice of our cause, I firmly believe that in the grand sweep of things a great success will be our reward. It is true the greatest test of courage is to bear defeat without losing heart. Our cause is just. Our hearts are full of cheer. For the right of the people we will faithfully contend, believing that right, honestly and persistently pressed, has a passport to victory sooner or later.

Mr. Chairman, the question under consideration is a great and momentous one. It is overtopped by none other, not even by trusts, nor by expansion and imperialism. It is a radical departure, pregnant with evil, which some day will prove a curse to this country. Unmindful of party creed, the American people all over this land are watching this Congress. They feel and know that no graver problems ever confronted an American Congress for solution than meet this one at its very threshold. Among these problems for solution is this one. It is hoped by them, when we have acted on this one, along with the other great and new problems, that it may be so executed that they may gather fresh inspiration in the stability of our Government and in the cause of human freedom. Our duty can well be performed if we are simply honest, intelligent, and patriotic. If we earnestly desire to hand over to our country an increased legacy of power and glory, we must so act. In so doing, intelligence, justice, and prosperity will continue with increased force to dwell in our land.

Mr. Chairman, the position, aim, and design of the Republican party as voiced in this bill is absolutely startling; it is bold; it is defiant. I think it can be truthfully denominated as a bill in the interest of bondholders. It is practically turning the financial system of the Government into the hands of the money power of the country. This bill has not only their hearty cooperation, but they are the power behind the throne. To fasten the gold standard upon the country is their aim. This bill, if passed, will accomplish that for them. They are clamoring for it. Solemnly do they echo in tones of commanding confidence, one to another, the cry of "sound money," "honest money." They cry out aloud to those who are under obligations to them, We must have it now, right now. In response to this demand all other business is laid aside by this House. Yea, all precedents are violated to railroad this pet measure of theirs through this House. If the bondholders of this country had prepared this bill, could it have been made stronger in their interest? Right here let me read a part of the bill. Sections 2 and 4 read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section. Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve fund taken up on the books of the division of issue and redemption as herein provided, and for this purpose he may from time to time transfer to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or may exchange any of the funds in the division of issue and redemption for other funds which may be in the general fund of the Treasury, and in addition thereto he is hereby authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of said reserve fund, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year. But no transfer shall at any time be made from the general fund of the Treasury to the division of issue and redemption which will reduce the general fund below $50,000,000. That all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, presented for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin at the will of the holder, and all silver certificates presented for redemption shall be redeemed in accordance with existing law.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to use said reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government, and if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States. The notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held in and constitute a part of said redemption fund and shall not be withdrawn therefrom nor disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes or certificates were redeemed or exchanged, except as hereinafter provided in this section. Nothing in this act shall be construed as repealing that provision of the act approved July 14, 1890, which provides that "no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes."

Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to discuss these sections of the bill in all of their bearings. See what extraordinary power it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury! It makes all bonds payable in gold! In all of its provisions it thirsts for gold! It writes gold into all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States Treasury notes are payable in gold; and all obligations, public and private, for the payment of money are to be paid in gold. It places in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury full and complete authority to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of the reserve fund, the bonds, and interest and principal are payable in gold. He is especially charged to use the reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government.

It further provides that if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued by the Government. It is permissible to national banks to issue notes to the full amount of their bond deposit without any additional security. Such are some of the sweeping and drastic measures in this bill, the ultimate object of which is to bind the country to the gold standard, thereby inflicting a cruel wrong on it, seeking to enslave the people.

This law is not needed. The people have not demanded it. When its unjust and I might say cruel provisions are thoroughly understood by the people, they will repudiate it and hurl from power the party that enacted it. From the signs I see around me, this bill will be passed; but that will not quiet the discussion on this great question. The more it is discussed, the plainer it will appear to the people that it has the appearance of legalized robbery.

Mr. Chairman, in support of this measure much has been said about the prosperity in our land. I admit that times are better. I will admit that labor finds ready employment, and I pray to God that it may not only remain with us, but go on and on, growing brighter and better as the months and years roll round. It is loudly heralded abroad that this is an evidence, an object lesson, that bimetalism is wrong and the gold standard is right. We are taunted with this. Who brought around better times? Was it the Republican party? Was it the gold standard? No. One reason is that within the last few years the money volume has been increased to an unprecedented extent, and in a manner and way that no one saw or reasonably expected. It came not by the bidding or through the instrumentality of any party or statutory law.

Nature has responded copiously to the toiler of the mines. In 1898 the production of gold was the greatest in the history of the world by many millions. That we may get a clear conception of what I am trying to impress, let me briefly surround myself with all the facts, or rather data, in reference to the production of gold and silver within the last hundred years in the world. At the risk of being tedious I herewith submit the following table, which speaks for itself. This table was incorporated in the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET]. I find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 12, from which I take this:

Product of gold and silver in the world since 1800.

[The annual production of 1800 to 1872 is obtained from five-year period estimates, compiled by Dr. Adolph Soetbeer. Since 1872 the estimates are those of the Bureau of the Mint.]

In addition to this table I will say that from another authority I find that the world's production of gold and silver from 1800 to 1890, and including the present time, is given in round numbers as follows below, which for the period from 1800 to 1898 practically agrees with the above table. That statement is as follows:

The average annual production of gold in the world for the first forty years of the present century, as given by Soetbeer, was $10,588,941. The average annual production of silver for the same period was $55,895,000, making a little over $66,000,000 annually of both gold and silver for the world. From 1800 to 1890 the production of gold averaged $26,332,000; that of silver, $32,400,000 annually, or $68,732,000 of both. From 1800 to 1890 the production of gold rose to $133,201,000, while that of silver increased to $57,268,000, giving for both metals an average of $170,557,000, nearly three times that of the previous decade. From 1800 to 1870 the annual production of gold fell to an average of $120,988,000 and silver rose to $50,717,000, making for both $171,677,000.

From 1870 to 1890 the annual production of gold fell to $115,000,000 and silver rose to $61,850,000, coining value, making for both this decade $236,850,000, the first time in the history of the precious metals when their production rose above $200,000,000 in a single year. From 1890 to 1898 the annual production of gold still declined, falling for this decade to $106,000,000, while that of silver continued to rise until it reached $172,000,000, coining value, making for both metals for this decade $278,000,000. But as silver had been partially demonetized since 1873, the monetary effect was less than the coining value here given.

From 1893 to 1893, when the mints of India were closed and the silver law in the United States was repealed, the annual production of gold rose to $132,000,000 and silver to $176,000,000. Since 1893 the production of gold has continued to increase, rising for the fiscal year 1894 to $181,000,000; $198,000,000 in 1895, $232,000,000 in 1896, $237,000,000 in 1897, and $250,000,000 in 1898—the highest in the world's history, and larger, as we see, than the production of both metals at any time prior to 1891, and eight times the average production of both metals during the first forty years of the century and one and a half times the average annual production of both from 1869 to 1880, and more than the average annual production of both from 1880 to 1891.

Mr. Chairman, again there is another potent factor in making times apparently good. I say apparently good, for to the toiling masses they are not as good and prosperous to them in proportion as to the money power. Never within the history of this country had the money power such supreme command and control. They are driving with a free rein. It is the trust of trusts. It has created a kind of false prosperity. It has cornered nearly every manufactured article and thereby run the prices up. In doing so, I admit it has put in motion all kinds of factories, giving employment to all. While it has done this, yet it has also raised the prices of nearly all manufactured goods and articles to an abnormal point, thereby compelling all consumers, and especially the toiling masses, to pay unnecessary, yet exacting, tribute to them. The passage of this bill increases its power, and decreases the liberties and the rights of the people.

To place the power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury and that of the national banks to issue and control the currency of this Union is a bold and dangerous step. Under the provision of the law it virtually gives them the power to issue and control the currency at will or as their interest may dictate. Unquestionably this creates, fosters, and maintains the most dangerous trust of them all—a money trust, which, I fear, will finally control the Government. I do not think I speak extravagantly when I say this. These trusts are a cruel and wicked conspiracy against the prosperity and liberties of the people. In most cases they are a vast horde of legalized plunderers. It is true these trusts are condemned in the President's message, though fostered, I fear, by some of the measures of his party—notably, this financial bill.

Right here I will remark, by the way of parenthesis, that some of the advocates of this measure assert that as some of the eminent financiers endorse this bill and urge its passage, therefore that should be a weighty argument in its favor. I will not stop here to discuss this proposition at length, but will modestly suggest to our self-confident opponents that we have as able financiers on our side of the question as the country can show and who will not suffer by comparison with any. I am sorry, truly sorry, to say we have in the last few years lost a few of our supporters in a rather hurried way. If I mistake not, among some of the distinguished lights and financiers who were once with us is the present Chief Executive and a late Secretary of the Treasury, to say nothing of numerous members who are now on this floor of the House who were once with us, but are now advocating this bill. This defection may prove something or nothing. Just why all this change of front, whether in the line of progress or not, might present a question for debate.

But I must return back to the subject of the increase of gold. An eminent authority on this line says:

What bearing, then, has the recent increase in the production of gold, which has reached, as we have seen, unprecedented and unexpected dimensions, on the money question as viewed from the standpoint of bimetallicists? The effect on prices and business is, of course, the same as it would be if, instead of the present supply being all gold, it were part silver, with free coinage for both metals, as before 1873. In other words, it is the increased supply and not the particular kind of metal that tells. That is the quantity theory of money upon which bimetallicists base their contentions, and to admit that the increased supply of gold keeps up prices and helps business is to admit the quantity theory of money.

Admitting the good effects of the present large production of gold, would it be safe to rest the monetary system of the world for all time upon the accidental production of one metal for a year or for a dozen years? Not years, but centuries—ages—must be taken into view when considering a question like that of a standard of value which extends indefinitely into the future.

The periods in the world's history when the supply of the precious metals has been sufficient to sustain and vitalize industry and commerce have been short and infrequent, while the periods when the blight of an insufficient supply of money has debilitated the energies of mankind and stayed the progress of the world have been long and frequent.

What has been will be again. No geologist believes that the present rate of production of gold can last very long, much less be permanent, while the world's activities, if not again checked by another dearth of money, will continue to increase as civilization increases and spreads over the world.

This increase in the gold supply, Mr. Chairman, instead of proving that the gold standard is correct and the bimetallicist is wrong, demonstrates what we have been contending for all the time—more basic money—is correct. The increase in the production of gold for 1898 is more than the combined production of gold and silver for any year prior to 1891. That is to say, if at that period and prior thereto gold and silver had been freely coined at the ratio of 16 to 1, it would not have been as great as the production of gold to-day; that is, for the year 1898. Again, I repeat for emphasis, that the production of gold for 1898 is greater "than the production of both metals at any time prior to 1891, and eight times the average production of both metals during the first forty years of the century, and one and a half times the average annual production of both from 1869 to 1880, and more than the average annual production of both from 1880 to 1890."

From this statement, which I presume no one will deny, one clearly sees that it is the volume of money in circulation that the country needs and "not the particular kind of metal." I presume all will admit that the increased production of gold has had something to do with the prosperous times. Then, to admit that is to admit the quantity theory of money. I am told it is confidently expected for the year 1899 the production of gold for the world will reach the fabulous sum of $400,000,000. Think of it. This is nearly twice as great as the production of both metals for any one year prior to 1891. One of the chief arguments of the gold-standard men prior to and since 1891 to the "free coinage of silver" was that it would "flood" the country with too much money.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the combined production of both at that time is less than the production of gold for the year 1898 and is far less, by over $100,000,000, for the year 1899. This, in my judgment, clearly demonstrates the falsity of the position of those who urged that the free coinage of silver would place too much money in circulation. If that argument was good then, it is good now. But, in the name of justice, do you hear anyone crying out that the country is now "flooded" with gold? Do you hear anyone warning us against a still greater "flood" of gold for this year, that is pouring itself into the lap of the world? No; it is welcomed by all. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, if any fair and contemplative mind will analyze these facts, he must inevitably conclude that the bimetallicist theory is correct. Well, it may be said as gold in such quantities has been discovered and put into circulation, that we do not need any more money; that is to say, "free silver." My answer to that is, "Would it be safe to rest the monetary system of the world for all time upon the accidental production of one metal for a year or for a dozen years?" I say, no. But I contend, further, that with the increased population and business over this country, if the production of gold should continue indefinitely at the present annual output, then it would not swell the volume of money too great to have the free coinage of silver along with it, but, on the contrary, it would be beneficial to business and the country at large. By reference to the above table of the annual production of gold and silver we see the production of the two metals for the year 1898, which is the greatest by millions in the history of the world for any one year, amounts to the sum of $501,146,000. The business of the world could easily utilize this sum at an annual yield for all years to come. The unprecedented increase in the world's business and activities, progress, and population, calls for more and more money every year to sustain them, and that desired end can not be reached without the free coinage of silver.

Mr. Chairman, within my limited time this is about as far as I can pursue this line of argument.

Mr. Chairman, this clamor for the gold standard and for this willful degradation of silver by adverse legislation is in the interests of schemers and bondholders who add nothing to the wealth of the country by either industry or invention. To any fair and impartial mind, without argument, one can see that the gold standard could be easily and quickly reduced to a pitiable condition by the use of similar methods. Gold and silver walked side by side at a certain ratio for years, and that happy situation remained until, by a stealthy process of arbitrary legislation, the settled order was overthrown, to the ruin of business and to the misery of countless multitudes of our people. Who is asking for this legislation? The bondholders. The Republican party promised earnest efforts to aid in securing international remonetization. Their efforts in earnest to do so have only been excelled by their earnestness to the contrary.

This cry that we are in danger, or ever have been in danger from an overflow of money, is absolutely without foundation. The output of the mines have been somewhat varied in different years, but the general average of uniformity has been very remarkable always. But what happened in 1873? It is well known that the blow, the murderous blow silver received then by the act of that year was not demanded by the people or any party of this country. Situations of affairs afforded no excuse, in any point of view, for the radical change then wrought out in any such a manner. So secretly, and I might say stealthily, was it done that even the President was not aware of the intent of the drastic movement.

Mr. Chairman, may I not be justified in saying that the ultimate effect of this bill is to enrich the wealthy and impoverish the poor? It contracts the circulating medium, making money scarce, while it opens the door wide for additional bond issues without limit; gives the national banks absolute control of all the money in the United States; renders even the Government subject to the greed of the millionaire and national banks; it decreases the circulating medium and increases the number of national banks. It does seem, Mr. Chairman, that the concentration of the power in the hands of the few and the concentration of the wealth in the great money centers has gone so far that they have become bold and "want the earth and the fullness thereof."

When you pass this bill no measure that will pass this Congress, or has ever passed the American Congress, will be more withering and crushing in the long run to the business interests of this country. Barring our future action on the Philippine question and kindred ones, other legislation we do here may come and go, wither and perish, but the evil and bitter fruit that will necessarily flow from the passage of this bill, will, in my judgment, live and abide long after we are asleep in the bosom of mother earth. In the name of the people whom I represent I do most solemnly protest against the passage of this bill. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, some of my colleagues on this side have expressed surprise at the extraordinary methods resorted to by the majority to pass this bill. And it is remarkable that a measure of such vast importance should be rushed through in such hot haste. However, there is no room for surprise. The gold power never deals fairly with any question in which its interests are involved. In 1873 it slipped the demonetization of silver through both Houses of Congress and across the President's desk without discovery, very much as a burglar slips through a house at midnight and robs sleeping victims of their jewelry and coin. In 1892 it inserted in the Democratic platform a declaration in favor of admitting both metals to coinage without discrimination against either, but in language of such straddling duplicity that it was construed as a condemnation of the coinage ratio. Mr. Cleveland was there nominated for President. He accepted the nomination and thus gave the country to understand that he would uphold the platform, yet within a few months after his election he called Congress together for the sole purpose of striking down silver coinage altogether.

In 1896 the gold power wrote into the Republican platform a declaration favoring international bimetalism and nominated for the Presidency that gifted orator, Mr. McKinley, whose resonant voice had so lately been reverberating throughout the land in favor of silver coinage and in denunciation of Mr. Cleveland for his hostility to the white metal. From the very day of his election he used all of the influence of his high office to obstruct the international bimetalism for which his platform had declared. Now comes this bill, fresh from the hands of the gold power, to be galloped through, under its whip, in violation of all legislative precedent, to the end that the monopoly conferred by it may be put into the stocking of the national banking trust as a Christmas gift.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to every feature of this remarkable bill. No measure ever came before Congress fraught with more danger to the people than this.

I am opposed to it because it establishes a single gold standard. I do not believe that there is enough gold to transact the business of the world and maintain stability of prices.

Gentlemen on the other side tell us that parity between the two metals could not be maintained. The Government has never tried to maintain a parity, but, on the contrary, has used every means to destroy it, at the instance of the gold power. Let there be no discrimination against either metal. Let the debtor, whether it be the Government or an individual, make payment in the metal most easily obtained and there will never be any trouble about parity.

We are told that the depreciation in silver bullion renders it inexpedient to attempt to maintain silver coinage. Depreciation of silver bullion has resulted from denying it access to the mints. Admit it to coinage on an equality with gold, and silver bullion will be worth as much as silver coin and either will be worth as much as gold. No man having silver bullion would sell it for less than he could get for it at the United States Mint.

You say that you are not willing to coin 50 cents' worth of bullion into a dollar in money. Oh, no; you are too honest for that, but you are willing to coin $3 worth of the farmer's wheat, $3 worth of the farmer's hogs into a single dollar in gold, and you have done it.

My Republican friends, why is it that the gold power requires you to demonetize silver? We cannot accept your statement that it is because of the depreciation in silver bullion. You were as determined in your efforts to demonetize it in 1873, when the bullion in a silver dollar was worth $1.02 in gold coin, as you are now. The object of demonetization then was and now is to enhance the value of gold at the expense of the people.

I am opposed to the bill because it provides for an unlimited increase in our bonded debt. I am one of those who believe that we should be paying off our debt, not increasing it. This measure gives to the Secretary of the Treasury power to issue bonds whenever in his discretion he may deem it necessary, and he will deem it necessary whenever the national banking trust shall demand it. So it is that to confer these special bounties upon the national banking trust you not only burden the people now living with all the hardships they can carry, but you lay a heavy debt on the country to be paid out of the toil of generations yet unborn. You sell our very children into slavery to the gold power.

I oppose this bill because it will retire our greenbacks from circulation. The people are satisfied with that form of currency. Let the Government issue directly whatever paper money is needed, and not turn that function over to be exercised by the national banking trust. Republicans say that they want the Government to go out of the banking business. Without stopping to discuss the soundness of that proposition, I assert that it is more important that the banks should go out of the governing business. It is not necessary, however, for the Government to go into the banking business in order to keep the greenbacks in circulation. Gentlemen tell us that the greenbacks serve as an endless chain to deplete the gold reserve. This could never have been had the Secretary of the Treasury obeyed the law instead of yielding to the dictates of the gold power. When greenbacks were presented for redemption, had they been redeemed in that metal which it was most easy and convenient to obtain, not a greenback would have been presented for redemption. That is what the plain letter of the law required.

I am opposed to this bill because it creates a trust and confers upon it privileges and immunities not conferred upon the rest of the people. It grants a monopoly. The bank currency provided for in this bill is made secure, not by the solvency of the bank, but by the bonds deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury. Then why should not any bank, or any person having bonds, have the right to deposit them and take currency? There are many banks, thousands of them in the country, which are not national banks, that are abundantly solvent. The purpose of the bill is to limit the special privileges granted to a few hundred national banks which compose the trust.

This bill confers upon the national banking trust the power to issue and regulate the volume of currency. It can make money plentiful or make it scarce as best suits its purpose. It can make money plentiful in one part of the country and scarce in another, as it may choose. It can hurt the whole country. It can hurt one part of the country and help another. The national banking trust under this law can issue currency up to the full amount of bonds it can control, or it can decline to issue any at all. Having issued money, it may call in any or all of it, as may best suit its stock-jobbing purposes. By these processes it can control prices and keep markets continually fluctuating and disturbed. Some very good object lessons as to how this may be done have been given within the last few days. A week ago there was a slump in the stock market. A review of it in a financial paper contained the following:

Having accomplished the object desired in bringing about a general slump in the stock market through the manipulation of money and sterling exchange rates, the Rockefellers, through the National City Bank, helped along an easier tendency in to day's call loans.

Here we have the Rockefellers, through their bank, making money tight and prices low on one day while they buy what they want, and on the next day, through the same bank, they make money easy and prices high while they sell what they bought so cheap the day before in a panic of their own making. A week later another slump in prices occurred, and here is a statement of it contained in a paper which I hold:

The Standard Oil crowd have done what they wanted—they have forced the Boston and Montana interests to sell out their property to them by all but breaking a big bank. When the Montana people surrendered, the Standard Oil withdrew the pressure and skipped $3,500,000 from New York to Boston to help the bank out. But in the meantime a lot of people were hurt in the smash.

What tremendous power to be in the hands of a Rockefeller; and yet this is the influence to which the Republican party is giving the power to issue the people's money and regulate the volume of it, to expand or contract the currency, to raise or lower prices at will and in its own interest instead of the people's.

I am opposed to this bill because it will make the national banking trust a factor to be reckoned with in our political contests. It will desire to guard the special privileges granted and obtain others from time to time, and will endeavor to see that a friendly President and Congress is selected.

The gentleman from Ohio, as well as others upon that side, have had the hardihood to cite Andrew Jackson and Thomas Benton as supporters of the policies of this bill. The greatest achievement of those two great statesmen was the overthrow of just such a financial trust as is being created here. It took them seven years to accomplish that result. We could not do better now than to listen to the words of Mr. Benton. In a speech in the United States Senate he said:

This mass of power, thus ramified and thus directed, must necessarily become, under prolonged existence, the absolute monopolist of American money, the sole manufacturer of paper currency, and the sole authority to which the Federal Government, the State governments, the great cities, corporate bodies, merchants, traders, and every private citizen must, of necessity, apply, for every loan which the exigencies may demand. "The rich ruleth the poor, and the borrower is the servant of the lender." Such are the words of Holy Writ; and if the authority of the Bible admitted of corroboration, the history of the world is at hand to give it. But I will not cite the history of the world, but one example only, and that of a nature so high and commanding as to include all others, and so near and recent as to be directly applicable to our own situation. I speak of what happened in Great Britain in the year of 1793, when the Bank of England, by a brief and unceremonious letter to Mr. Pitt, such as a miser would write to a prodigal in a pinch, gave the proof of what a great moneyed power could do, and would do, to promote its own interests in a crisis of national alarm and difficulty. I will read the letter. It is exceedingly short; for after the compliments are omitted there are but three lines of it. It runs thus:

"It is the wish of the court of directors that the chancellor of the exchequer would settle his arrangement of finances for the present year in such manner as not to depend upon any further assistance from them beyond what is already agreed for."

Such were the words of this memorable note, sufficiently explicit and intelligible; but to appreciate it fully we must know what was the condition of Great Britain at that time. It was the year 1793, and the beginning of that year, than which a more portentous one never opened on the British Empire. The war with the French Republic had been raging two years, Spain had just declared war against Great Britain, Ireland was bursting into rebellion, the fleet in the More was in open mutiny, and the cry for the reform of abuses and the reduction of taxes resounded through the land. It was a season of alarm and consternation, and of imminent actual danger to Great Britain; and this was the moment which the bank selected to notify the minister that no more loans were to be expected. What was the effect of the notification? It was to paralyze the Government and subdue the minister to the purposes of the bank.

From that day forth Mr. Pitt became the minister of the bank, and before two years were out he had succeeded in bringing all the departments of Government to his own slavish condition. He stopped the specie payments of the bank, and made its notes the lawful currency of the land. For twenty years the bank was the dominant power in England; and during that disastrous period the public debt was increased $2,000,000,000, and that by a bank which, according to its own declarations, had not a shilling to lend at the beginning of the period. I omit the rest. I say nothing of the general subjugation of the country banks, the rise in the price of food, the decline in wages, the increase of crime and taxes, the multiplication of lords and beggars, and the frightful demoralization of society. I only seize the central figure in the picture, that of a government arrested in the midst of war and danger by the veto of a moneyed corporation, and only permitted to go upon condition of assuming the odium of stopping specie payments and sustaining the promissory notes of an insolvent bank as the lawful currency of the land.

This single feature suffices to fix the character of the times, for when the Government becomes the servant of the lender the people themselves become its slaves. Can not the Bank of the United States act in the same way? It certainly can, and just as certainly will when time and opportunity serve and interest may prompt. * * * What grounds for alarm and terrible apprehension when, with so many independent States, so many rival commercial cities, so much sectional jealousy, such violent political parties, such fierce contests for power, there should be but one moneyed tribunal before which all the rival and contending elements must appear—but one single dispenser of money, to which every citizen, every trader, every merchant, every planter, every manufacturer, every corporation, every city, every State, and the Federal Government itself must apply in every emergency for the indispensable loan, and this in the face of the fact that in every contest for human rights the great moneyed institutions have uniformly been found on the side of kings and nobles and against the lives and liberties of the people.

This was the language of the great Benton, and it does not sound much like he favored a national banking trust, such as the Republicans are calling into existence by this measure. Not less pronounced was the opposition of General Jackson. When the decrepitude of advancing years called him to private life, he wrote a farewell address to the American people, in which he dwelt upon the evils of a banking trust and bank currency; and as a rebuke to the audacity of those who have cited him in support of this measure it may be proper to quote some of his language. He said:

In reviewing the conflicts which have taken place between different interests in the United States and the policy pursued since the adoption of our present form of government, we find nothing that has produced such deep-seated evil as the course of legislation in relation to the currency. The Constitution of the United States unquestionably intended to secure to the people a circulating medium of gold and silver; but the establishment of a national bank by Congress, with the privilege of issuing paper money, receivable in the payment of the public dues, and the unfortunate course of legislation in the several States upon the same subject, drove from general circulation the constitutional currency and substituted one of paper in its place.

Certainly there is nothing in this language to give comfort to the advocates of this bill, for he declares gold and silver both to be the money of the Constitution and condemns national-bank paper in the strongest terms. He says again, further along:

The corporations which create the paper money can not be relied upon to keep the circulating medium uniform in amount. In times of prosperity, when confidence is high, they are tempted by the prospect of gain, or by the influence of those who hope to profit by it, to extend their issues of paper beyond the bounds of discretion and the reasonable demands of business, and when these issues have been pushed on from day to day until public confidence is at length shaken, then a reaction takes place and they immediately withdraw the credits they have given, suddenly curtail their issues, and produce an unexpected and ruinous contraction of the circulating medium which is felt by the whole community. The banks by this means save themselves, and the mischievous consequences of their imprudence or cupidity are visited on the public.

This grand statesman has given us warning against what the Republican majority of this House is about to do, and if we were wise and patriotic we would heed his warning. But the difficulty here is that not the representatives of the people but the representatives of the banking trust are in the majority.

Mr. Chairman, the moving hands of the clock warn me that my time has almost expired and that I must hurry along. Gentlemen of the Republican side had much to say about the higher range of prices of certain commodities prevailing and the era of prosperity now said to exist. They claim that this has been brought about by the gold standard and the present Administration. My Republican friends, on this as on all other questions you have shown yourselves to be insincere opportunists. Do you say now that higher prices are beneficial to the people? In 1896 you said that you wanted the best dollar in the world—the dollar with the largest purchasing power. You said that you not only wanted low prices, but constantly decreasing prices, and that the election of McKinley and the assurance of the gold standard would insure these. Standing on this floor in 1896, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said:

I know of no man whose wail is heard because of the fall in prices of wheat, grains, food, cloth, clothing and the implements of husbandry and trade, and all that go to administer to the comfort, the health, and the needs of every man, rich or poor, in his own home, except the advocate of the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

This was the Republican view then. On the other hand, Democrats and Populists said that they wanted better prices and that an increase in volume of money would increase prices. The great increase in the output of the gold mines of the world has greatly increased the volume of money in circulation, and this has resulted in better prices, just as we said it would. The result has vindicated the correctness of the principle we contended for. If the increase in the volume of money in circulation caused by the increase in the gold supply has brought a slight improvement, then how much greater would have been the increase if the money volume had been swelled by silver coinage? Other things besides the increase in the volume of money have helped prices. Bad crops abroad and a good crop at home have set the balance of trade in our favor. Surely, with all their gall, Republicans will not claim that either the famine abroad or the good crops at home were caused by the election of McKinley or the establishment of the gold standard.

But, after all, the increase in prices to the producer has been very slight. There is no such era of prosperity as we have heard talked about by the other side. Wherever there has been any marked increase in prices it has been of those things sold by trusts, where prices have been arbitrarily raised and not from the natural course of trade. The farmer is selling his wheat for less than he did a year ago and is paying two and one-half times as much for his barbed wire; is selling his hogs at the same old price and paying $3.50 for the nails he bought a year ago for $1.50. This is the character of most of the prosperity now afflicting the country. This is the kind of prosperity that robs the poor to add to the wealth of the rich. That is the purpose of the bill now under consideration. Can you pass it? Will you do it? Yes; you must do it. The trusts demand it. But in after years, when another generation groans under the weight of the debt you are now putting upon the country, your children will rise up to curse you. This abomination will pass into a stain in our statutes, but it will not remain. A long-suffering people will blot it out. The Republican party will be driven from power, and, in the fear of God, William J. Bryan will act as the Chief Magistrate of this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I know that as a rule it is better for new members to listen to those who are their seniors in point of public service and to talk but little themselves. But were I to remain silent while the iniquities of this bill are being fastened upon the American people I would be untrue to the platform on which I was nominated, recreant to the trust reposed in me, and false to the principles and doctrines that I myself have always taught. I come, Mr. Chairman, fresh from the hands of the mountaineers of north Alabama, among whom I first saw God's sunlight, among whom I first breathed the pure mountain air, and with it inhaled the very inspirations of liberty itself. Among these people I first learned to hate tyranny and to despise the tyrant, whether it came in the form of some despot himself or that of despotic influences and interests which step by step sap the life-blood of freedom and bind her votaries hand and foot.

When these people met in convention, without my seeking, and, indeed, against my most solemn protest, they placed in my hands the banner of Democracy, and upon every hilltop and in every valley I spread its ample folds to reflect the sunlight of liberty and to catch the afflatus of freedom.

When I asked that convention to recall its nomination and place the standard in the hands of some one better able and more desirous of bearing it, and this was refused, I then asked them to write upon it the Chicago platform, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," and that I would lead them to victory, because the people and the people's God would then be upon our side.

When this was done I went forth to battle, and from that day till the polls closed I never doubted the result. Then, Mr. Chairman, with these recollections crowding thick and fast upon me, may I not well say that I would be recreant to my people were I not to raise my voice against what I believe to be the crowning infamy of the Republican party since the days of the "force bill" and carpetbag rule? The Republican party has boasted itself as being the party of freedom and of liberty. It points with pride to the fact that at one stroke of the pen it struck the shackles of slavery from 5,000,000 human beings. For this work I give it credit, and from a honest heart thank God that slavery in the South is forever gone.

But, Mr. Chairman, when this bill passes and begins to show its hideous fangs, I fear that around the limbs of millions of toiling Americans will be riveted chains of poverty and despair harder and more binding than those which you struck from the black man's arms. And in after years, when from the mountain tops of north Alabama and from all over the South and the West the gaunt, hungry fingers of an impoverished people are pointed at you, I can say to those who are now gloating over their brief power, "Shake not your gory locks at me," for "thou didst it." A gentleman in this discussion has said that he wished that the Republican party could give this bill as a Christmas gift to the country. Such thoughts are sacrilege and worthy only of the followers of those who upon the natal day of the Christ child were the money gamblers in the temple, on whom in after years the righteous indignation of the same Christ child was destined to fall. What does that Christmas celebrate? The birth of Him of whom angels from heaven, beneath Judean stars, upon Judean hills, to Judean shepherds, heralded "Peace on earth, good will to men."

But, Mr. Chairman, if I read this bill aright, it carries not one breath of "peace on earth" or "good will to men," but in almost every word it carries the elements of oppression and want. No chord of love or good will can be evoked from its bosom, but the harsh strains of avarice and greed come from its every touch. A few years ago that party which is now bartering its very soul to the money fiend professed to be the friend of silver as well as gold. In its platform of 1888 it denounced the Democratic party in the following terms: "The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver." Was it sincere then? Who can contrast its utterances then with those heard to-day and recognize even the shadow of its former self? On the committee which reported this platform we find the distinguished gentleman who to-day sits at the helm and guides the ship of state. But, oh, how changed!

Coming on down but four brief years to 1892, we again find the Grand Old Party declaring its friendship for silver, but in more restricted terms. Slowly, yet surely, it was seeking to be struck by the aspen sting of gold, and in the following terms does it deliver itself along this line:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetalism, and the Republican party demand the use of both gold and silver as a standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. We commend the wise and patriotic steps taken by our Government to secure an international conference and adopt such measures as will insure a parity between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

Four more years roll by, and we find it in open flirtation with this gilded, painted maid, and in its self-sought sleep it lays its head in this Delilah's lap, seeking to be shorn. This is its utterance:

The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of the law providing for the resumption of specie payments in 1870. Since then every dollar has been as good as gold. We are unalterably opposed to any measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. We are, therefore, opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such an agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved. All our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States, and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

Who could be deceived by such utterances as these? Many there were so credulous as to believe that beneath this tempting bait there lurked no cruel hook. Still her speakers went forth, wearing this transparent mask, and, like the ostrich, thought if but the head was hid no part was exposed to view. Many were deceived by the words of their oily politicians, who were—

By smooth dissimulation skilled to grace;
A devil's nature with an angel's face.

And when the polls were closed Nebraska's noble son had fallen with his face still to the foe. Then it was that the money power laughed and said, "We've gotten all we want." Our coffers were invaded and we were made to bleed, but soon it will all come back. Slowly the stealthy tread of the assassin of silver and the enemy of the people has marched for years along the corridors and within these halls with hidden blade, but now beneath this Dome, in broad daylight, it is drawn to deal the fatal blow.

The mask of dissimulation is now thrown off, and those who eight years ago acknowledged the people as their only lords and feared to disobey their will now boldly bow before the golden calf. Scarcely a decade has passed since it denounced the Democratic party for trying to do what it is about to do. But—

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Mr. Chairman, do you suppose, or is there one of the distinguished gentlemen who has spoken on the pending measure who does suppose, that if to the thousands of American pilgrims who visited the mecca of Republicanism in 1896, and from the vine-bowered cottage heard words of inspiration from their chief—that if that chief had proclaimed that the success of the Republican party meant the passage of this bill, he to-day would have been the nation's head? No, Mr. Chairman, no; but instead of going forth with thousands shouting at his triumphal car he would have been buried beneath an avalanche of American ballots so deep that no blast from HANNA's bugle horn could ever have disturbed his sleeping clay.

Mr. Chairman, there is no man who has a higher respect for the distinguished Chief Executive of this nation than I. There is no man who has a higher respect for the distinguished leaders of the Republican party than I. But I believe that when they fix this bill upon the American people they turn loose a Pandora's box of ills that no antidote of time can ever heal. They tell us that the bill is a mere declaration of what the law is now. If so, why waste thousands of dollars of the people's money in a work of supererogation? I believe that many of you would now in your heart of hearts pray that this cup might pass from you. But you have promised it, and with lash held high above your heads your master now demands the pay. 'Twas not thus nominated in the bond, but he tells you 'twas written thus between the lines.

Another national election is coming on. Another bond must soon be made to the same old usurer, and before your draft is honored he says in words that can not be misunderstood, "First pay what thou owest to the uttermost farthing." That, Mr. Chairman, explains your unseemly and indecent haste. Your national committee meets here to-morrow, and with it comes the money changer, and he presents your note. Gladly would you renew, but he tells you no. Pay what you owe and then borrow again. And then with folded hands you say, "'Tis thine to command, and mine to obey."

Recognizing their impotency to go before the people on the cold facts of their record, they know they must dicker with the money power for the sinews of war. It is a bitter pill for you to swallow, gentlemen of the Republican side, but your doctor says you must take it, and like little men you will gulp it down. You sugar-coated it for years, but now, with all its bitterness, you shut your eyes and swallow it down. Did I need argument to prove that bimetalism is right and a single gold standard is wrong, I could stand here till Christmas and quote from the speeches of your ablest men arguments stronger and more conclusive than I could make. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], understood to be the able mouthpiece of the Administration on this floor, by his frequent previous utterances furnishes many strong arguments for this side.

But against the heresies of the pending measure we need no appeal to Republican argument. It carries within its own bosom the seeds of its own condemnation. The second section of the bill is in violation of at least two principles of the Federal Constitution. It is obnoxious to that principle which makes both gold and silver the basic money of the Government and is violative of that principle which lends the emphasis of organic law to the inviolability of a contract.

When young liberty was an infant in its swaddling clothes, and the American people had first emerged from the sway of the tyrant, the fathers wrote into the fundamental law the doctrine that gold and silver both should be the money of the land. In that same instrument was ingrafted the principle that has always been the rule of good morals, that the law should never lend its sanction to the violation of contracts.

When in the contract of the bond monger was written the statement that it should be made payable in "coin," the purchaser took it with the knowledge of the fact, expressed in the instrument itself, that they could be paid either in silver or gold at the option of the Government. This agreement you now break for them by permitting them to demand payment in gold alone. The effect of such action is to enhance the value of their bonds, and the people are made to pay them an amount greatly in excess of what they agreed to take. Is this fair? Is it just? Is it honest? Let the American people answer. But you reply that it is equally unjust to pay these bonds in a debased money. If they agreed to take payment in a money liable to be debased, this was their contract, and they should abide by its terms.

But, Mr. Chairman, if silver has been debased, it was their hand which struck it down, and they are parties to the crime. Then shall they with bold assumption take advantage of their own wrong? No forum of conscience would permit it, and in no forum of the law should such monstrous views be ever known. Silver for a hundred years held companionship with gold, oftener being before than behind, and never did it become unsound till stricken by the heavy hand of law. The laws of trade could not dethrone it; the law of supply and demand could not do it, but it took the Congress to strike it down. Before you talk of unsound money, restore it to its legal place beside the yellow coin. Place it there upon the same plane by law as you place gold, and see if side by side they will not move with even tread. We who favor its restoration under the law, we who favor the legalized free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, are indeed the honest-money men, and not you who have dragged it from its pedestal beside the gold.

Another result, Mr. Chairman, of this second section will be to establish a gold monopoly, whose effects we are sure to feel. The President, in his recent message, argues against baneful trusts, and yet, when he puts the Executive signature to this bill, he gives the positive sanction of the law to the most gigantic trust ever turned loose upon the land. It requires all debts, both public and private, to be paid in gold. These are said to be over $50,000,000,000, greatly more than all the gold in circulation in all the world. Then suppose the devotees of gold should begin to demand payment in that coin of all these debts as they become due, where will the gold come from to pay them, and how soon will gold rise and sweat fall?

Then comes contraction and with it misery and squalid want not dreamed of in the philosophy of the most veritable calamity howler in all the land. There is another feature of contraction in this bill that is dangerous in the extreme. It is that which permits the withdrawal of hundreds of millions of dollars of greenbacks from circulation. It is no answer to this proposition to say that such confidence will be inaugurated by the passage of the bill as that no such contraction will take place. It is the history of all money sharks that whenever it is to their interest thus to do they will always play the card. The annals of all countries show that undue contraction of the currency always results in misery and suffering among God's poor. Those to whom the law should ever hold out its helping hand are those who soonest feel the evils of a money strain. Sir Archibald Allison, the great English historian, in his magnificent history of Europe, speaking of the evils of contraction, says:

Serious as these evils were, they did not excite any general attention as long as they were partial or confined chiefly to particular localities. But during the last fifteen years another cause of general influence has come into operation, which had rendered the evils complained of universal and engendered a general feeling of the necessity of its removal. This was the contraction of the currency, the prolific parent of all the social and political changes which have taken place in Great Britain during the last thirty years and the effects of which are far from being yet exhausted.

Thus prosperity under a system of currency mainly dependent on the retention of gold leads to alterations of prosperity and suffering as inevitably as night succeeds day and day night, and that altogether irrespective of drains of gold from extraneous causes such as war loans, extensive importations of grain owing to bad harvests, or the like—which necessarily and still more immediately lead to a ruinous contraction of the currency, and consequent stoppage of credit and general suffering.

The way, and the only way, to avoid this is perfectly simple, although such is the combined influence of the clear appreciation of the subject by a few interested parties on the one hand and the benighted ignorance of it by the vast majority of the sufferers under it on the other that an entire generation required to be rendered bankrupt, or go to their graves, before the subject was generally understood. This is to have two currencies in every commercial community—the one convertible on demand into the precious metals, for conducting its foreign transactions; the other not so convertible, to sustain its domestic industry.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I oppose this bill because in its third and fourth paragraphs, and in fact throughout the bill, it makes the Secretary of the Treasury a veritable autocrat of American finance. True to the traditions of the Republican party, it is a long stride toward their pet theory of centralized power. No more dangerous function of Government could be conferred on any man than is conferred on the Secretary by this bill. It gives him the right to insert the lance of autocratic power and draw from the arteries of Government every drop of life blood flowing through the same. In it you have a species of centralism more dangerous to liberty than all your standing armies. For when you bring the wolf to the poor man's door, and he sees his pale-faced wife and hungry children threatened by its fangs, you bind him hand and foot and crush the breath of liberty from his soul more nearly than in any other way.

The monopoly given to the national banks, Mr. Chairman, is an evil lurking in the bill that is but little less than those I have pointed out. Such powers are subversive of the doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," and should meet a just rebuke from every Democratic voter. But I have not time to further elaborate the iniquities with which this bill bristles from beginning to end.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 without awaiting the concurrence of any nation on God's green earth. I believe we are big enough and old enough to take care of ourselves. In this I differ from many of my warmest Democratic friends at home—men who are honest in their views and whose opinions I respect. I believe that William J. Bryan is to-day the ablest living exponent of the principles I have discussed, and I believe he will be its standard bearer for the second great battle.

I revere the traditions of my party as handed down by the fathers. I believe in its doctrines as taught by its sages and as exemplified in the lives of its statesmen. As such, and as I view conditions, I would be a traitor to my people and unworthy their commission were I not to lift my voice and record my vote against the pending measure. In the cabins and in the cottages upon the mountain tops and in the valleys of my native heath lives the yeoman, surrounded by his toil-worn wife and his little flock. God grant that no act or vote of mine may ever add to the burdens which they now bear, and that in every word I utter and every vote I cast while I stand as their representative upon this floor I may have no higher motive and no loftier aim than to promote their best interest and alleviate their conditions.

Then when I return to my home I can look them in the face and say of a truth, "Thy people are my people; thy country is my country; thy God is my God." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is here under orders from the Bankers' Association and the world's great money trust. Its title should read:

A bill to lock up and finally destroy all our silver dollars, greenbacks, and other issues of Government currency.

To give national banks a complete monopoly of the nation's credit and power of issuing all paper money, permitting them to expand or contract its volume at will.

To compel the people to pay the banks double interest on their capital—first, on their bonds (which are also free of all tax); second, on their bank notes.

To create and put in perpetual motion an endless chain to draw both gold and gold bonds from the Treasury at the will of the money trust.

To repudiate all existing money contracts, public and private, giving the creditor twice his legal right by compelling all debtors to pay in money of double value.

To create and support, at the expense of our people, the most powerful money trust of the world, giving it power to reduce wages and prices of all property at will.

Mr. Chairman, the iniquity of this legislation is partially but truly exposed by this revised title, yet some of its provisions are so villainous as to demand special mention in connection with the recent record of the Republican party and its leaders here and elsewhere.

REPUBLICAN TREACHERY TO SILVER.

During all these years of conflict between silver and gold (which is, in fact, the struggle of the great common people against the money trust) the Republican party has, until this act, professed to desire the full restoration of silver as "standard money." In 1890 President McKinley declared on the floor of this House:

I would give it (silver) equal credit and honor with gold; I would make no discrimination; I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither; I want the double standard.

In 1888 the Republican national platform contained this declaration:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver money.

In 1892 the Republican national platform declared as follows:

The Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money.

Standard money, Mr. Chairman. I call special attention to the importance of this fact, as it defines the attitude of the Republican party. In that year a question had arisen in the public mind as to what the Republican party meant in 1888, when it declared in favor of silver money. Did it mean token money, to be redeemed with gold, as this bill provides, or standard money, having all the powers that Congress could give to gold or any other money? To this question the party emphatically answered with the demand for "silver as standard money."

HOW THE MIGHTY HAVE FALLEN!

To-day we have before us in this bill proof that the Republican party has not only surrendered to the gold trust, but that it is ready to use its present absolute power to bind the people with this gold bond by all the powers that human law contains, and by this act prove itself a traitor and repudiator of its oft-repeated pledges to its members and the country. Of this act thousands of honest Republicans are making a note to-day and doubtless forming resolutions to quit the party for its treason to the people and its cowardly surrender to the demands of the money kings.

If any further proof of this cowardly surrender is necessary, I will quote from leading Republican members speaking officially on the floor of this House at still later dates. On February 14, 1895, the House having under discussion a resolution authorizing the issue of gold bonds, one of the very things which this bill now provides, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in opposition to gold bonds, said:

Fellow-Republicans, let me read to you our platform, the declaration of our principles upon which we have marched to both victory and defeat. In 1888 we said: "The Republican party is in favor of gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver." In 1892 we said: "The Republican party from tradition and interest favors bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as standard money." These are the declarations of our party, and, Mr. Speaker, as one faithful to this platform declaration, I will not vote for this measure.

At still later dates, even after the election of 1896, we find prominent Republicans on this floor declaring that their party is not a single gold-standard party and that its last national platform does not declare for the single gold standard. And now we have this single gold-standard bill before us, under "hurry-up" orders, being the first bill introduced on the first day of this the first Congress, since the conflict began, in which the gold party have held absolute control over this money question; here, too, not from any committee of this House, but direct from a Republican caucus, without a dissenting vote, acting on the demand of the great banking and money trust.

These facts, Mr. Chairman, are enough to bring the blush of shame to the face of every honest Republican, to hide which gentlemen on the other side cry "prosperity" and boast of the great increase of the volume of gold and bank notes, while in still louder tones they boast of increased debts, which they call "confidence."

ANSWER TO CLAIMS OF PROSPERITY.

Mr. Chairman, our answer to all this is that the present activities are not due to any acts of the Republican party. They are mainly the result of the war, accidents of the seasons, and multiplied debts. The war forced a debt (destined under this bill to grow) on the nation of two hundred millions, drawing that amount of money out of hiding and paid it into circulation. It has forced temporary employment of large numbers of our people.

The accidents of the seasons forced a temporary influx of gold, and the national banks have increased their debts by issuing more notes.

A still greater cause of present conditions is to be found in the resulting wild speculations in all classes of industrial properties and their multiplied debts under the manipulation of powerful trust syndicates.

When we analyze these causes we find fully 90 per cent of them are new forms of debts, which this bill declares shall be paid out of the people's products in such amounts as will buy 25.8 grains of gold for each dollar of all these vast debts.

Ah, my Republican gold-standard friends, do you realize what all this means? The best authenticated statistics we have place the aggregate of all debts in the United States at $40,000,000,000 and of the world at $150,000,000,000. This vast debt is steadily increasing, the annual interest being more than the world can pay, while we go on legislating to force our people still deeper into debt, deceiving ourselves by assuming that by statute laws we can make the impossible possible.

TO IMPROVE THE BILL.

Mr. Chairman, if the majority here would permit amendments to this bill, we would offer a number. One would be to permit any citizen to deposit United States bonds and draw currency thereon, stopping interest on all bonds so deposited by banks or others while on deposit. This would prevent the bank monopoly of the volume of our money and also save the people from paying double interest.

THE REAL ISSUE.

Mr. Chairman, the real issue involved in this whole money question is not between gold and silver alone; it is, in fact, a question of who shall issue and control our money supply. Shall we by this legislation make a gift of this great power and profit to the bank syndicate? They can not get it except by legislation. Or shall we retain this sovereign power in and for the people?

All money is the creation of law. In a republic all laws emanate from the people; hence the power to create and issue money is inherent and belongs to all the people.

The question of what substance we shall use to evidence our money power, whether paper, silver, or gold, like the questions of quantity, legal power, and method of issue, are matters of detail only.

This bill gives to a few bankers the sovereign money power of all the people, guaranteeing double interest to the banks on their entire capital—first, the interest on their Government bonds, which are free of all tax; second, bank interest on their notes. Every cent thus donated the people must pay.

This bill also gives the banks full power to increase their notes at will, but does not compel them to keep up any definite supply, thus leaving the control of the volume and value of money absolutely with the banks.

DESTRUCTION OF ALL GOVERNMENT MONEY.

To make room for these bank notes this bill is clearly intended to finally destroy as money all of our silver dollars and greenbacks as well as all Government currency, of which there is now in existence and use over nine hundred million dollars. Another reason why the silver dollar must be eventually destroyed is to prevent the States from legislating (as under the Constitution they have a right to do) to make them legal tender in payment of all debts.

The question will soon properly arise, when this law goes into effect, Why use fifty cents' worth of silver upon which to print a promise to pay a dollar in gold; why not sell the silver as bullion and print these promises on paper?

The intention of the bill is clearly to destroy all forms of Government money, including all silver dollars. It also forces the people to keep the value of all bank notes equal at all times to gold by making them receivable and interchangeable by the Government. To do this, new issues of Government gold bonds are to be kept on sale without limit.

This bill will cost the producers of our country not less than $200,000,000 annually, making them donate this amount to the banks. All of this great burden could be saved by proper legislation.

THE GOVERNMENT SHOULD ISSUE ALL MONEY.

To all this I would offer a substitute for the entire bill, providing for the issue of all money by the Government, giving to every dollar—whether paper, silver, or gold—full, absolute, and equal money power, receivable for all taxes and debts, paying the same into circulation on the Government expense account, thus reducing taxes and abolishing all issues of bonds forever, regulating the volume and value of such money by keeping it in a fixed ratio to the total quantity of all property in the nation, eliminating the debt system by making the money volume large enough to transact all business on a cash basis, neither authorizing nor enforcing debt contracts.

As material on which to evidence this money I would provide Government coinage of all silver and gold metals offered at the mints at the present ratio of 16 to 1, adding paper to regulate the total volume of money. I would provide, as now, a close watch over all exports and imports of money, supplementing the metal money in domestic use with such volume of paper money as would from time to time be necessary to regulate the value of the dollar in its average purchase or exchange relation to property. This can always be done by giving all money full legal-tender power, maintaining its total volume in a fixed ratio to the total quantity of all property, and eliminating the debt system.

MORE THAN THE GOLD STANDARD.

Mr. Chairman, I would warn members here and the country that this bill does much more than rivet the single gold standard upon our people; it ties them hand and foot, and delivers them as helpless victims into the hands of the world's most powerful money trust, a trust, too, whose strength, great as it is now, will be multiplied tenfold by the advantages it gives. As an index to what is coming upon the people I will present here an editorial from the pen of Alfred Henry Lewis, published in the Verdict, August 7, 1899, a paper, too, owned and controlled exclusively by O. H. P. Belmont, one of the moneyed kings of America:

HERE BE TRUE NEWS.

This is a grave story. It is one of even, near concern to small and great. Let it come unshod of simile, unbusked of imagery or rhetoric, unclouded of any mists of metaphor. In Wall street, as this is read, the giant trust of all is forming. It is to collect within itself the banks of New York City. Its core is to be Standard Oil. Its moving spirits are John Rockefeller and Pierpont Morgan. With them in full and close association are the Rothschilds and their American agents. It was to link the Rothschilds to the scheme that of late took Morgan Europeward and brought him back again. This trust at its consummation, which is close, will pull the reins of guidance and crack the whip of domination over $2,000,000,000. It will, as stated, be a master of the New York City banks. They are to be made into one force, united and brought under one word and one command. Thereafter they are to say "No" together, or "Yes" together, or together stand motionless and mute. This trust of the banks is to be the dictator trust; to overlord all other trusts. The greatest among these latter will be dwarfed as they stand beside it. We, the people, are to become the subjects of bank conquest and suffer the feudalism of money. This bank trust is to be our William of Normandy. New York City is to be its Hastings without a blow. It will have, as it were, a Doomsday book, and the country is to be parceled among its followers.

This is a true tale. There is neither guess nor fancy in its telling. Naught but the bald facts are set forth. This trust expects to hold the nation in the hollow of its hand. Their plan is to be the grand bank of the United States; issue at the last its money and have custody of its credit. In a cruder day Jackson defeated a parallel conspiracy; crushed beneath his stern heel the head of a similar serpent. With this difference: That was a python of seven and one-half millions, a baby and plaything to the one in hand. Now are we to confront a serpent of two billions, or one two hundred and fifty times as large. At a time, too, when the Jacksons seem gone from our midst. For a century and a quarter there has been liberty in this land. For a century and a quarter Europe, pointing to America, whether in hate or love, was driven to say with Job: "There the wicked cease from troubling; there the weary be at rest! There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor! The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master!" Once this trust of the banks, and Europe will say this no more. There will none to give tongue to it. The fact of freedom will have departed, the song would be a lie. In that day of gilded, narrow fetters the spirit of true Americanism will be crippled, bent, and broken. A slightest Samson, it will grind in the mills of the Philistines. It will long for destruction and dig for death as for treasures that lie hid.

Standard Oil is to be the heart of this bank trust. There is one known thing of Standard Oil. Its minimum profits are at least forty millions yearly. How much more they be is the jealous secret of Standard Oil, and none may pierce it. As stated, as captain-constructors of this bank trust are Rockefeller, Morgan, and the Rothschilds. They will go to New Jersey for organization. That State has grown the Morocco of America. Its statutes are the merest shipyards to build and launch and outfit these trust pirates of commerce. New Jersey, to be consistent, should adopt the black flag as its banner. It should float the Jolly Roger with skull and crossbones from the dome staff of its capital. Once this trust of the banks is afloat, it will have beneath its pennant every bank in New York. They must join or be destroyed. The old killing Standard Oil method will suffice for this. Then it will extend itself. Every bank in the country will become its gillie. There will be no limit to its sway. Its powers will find their last extension in the frontiers of the possible. It will loose and unloose credit. It will fix the price of money and censor the markets to the last item of value. It will pick up the national debt and hold the country between its thumb and finger. It will demand bonds and get them. Or it will force payment for them. It will stand at the spigot of loans. It will flow money on or off at its selfish interest or caprice.

All other businesses will set like beggars at its gates. It will be the Dives of trade, and commerce will become its Lazarus. If it likes you, you may have money; if it hates you, your ruin is within its reach. In short, controlling as it will the tides of credit in their ebb or flow, this bank trust will rule the mart. An autocrat, it will respond to nothing but itself. There will be none greater, none stronger. Congresses will exist by its consent, and Presidents wait hat in hand for its orders. It will have power of life and death in business; to lift up or strike down, to plant or uproot. Between the upper and nether millstones of its operations all men are to be ground; and all will be grist to its hopper. Elections will be at its mercy. It will produce in office its own paid, sworn follower. It will draw within the train of its control every element of government. You may change your White House every four years, your Congress every two; yet, once this trust of the banks be rooted, you'll never change your ruler. You will bow eternally before this never-dying, changeless dynasty of money.

SOCIALISM IS COMING.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I deem it my duty to take a broader view of the problems involved in this legislation. We are approaching the rapid culmination of the most tyrannical forms of capitalism. The owners of wealth as far back as we have history of human government have ever insisted that capital should have the legal right to draw to itself increase out of labor's productions. These wealth owners are ever present when laws are to be enacted and see to it that every power of government, legislative, executive, and judicial, shall be made to recognize and enforce this power of capital. Armies are instituted and directed in their operations to support and extend the rights and interests of capital, even in the present wars waged under its orders against the Filipinos and the Boers; we hear the bold demand of capital claiming its right to conquer those people in order that it may appropriate nature's rich resources, using our armies to hold the people there in subjection, while capital works them at a few pennies per day, throwing their product of rice, tobacco, sugar, cotton, etc., on the market to force down wages of our home people.

The hand of capitalism is even plainly visible in the treaty so recently made with Spain. By its terms we are bound to recognize and enforce all land and property titles that may have obtained in any and all the territory acquired, up to the very hour of its ratification, regardless of fraudulent methods or the plundering processes that had long since driven the people into open revolt. Ah! Mr. Chairman, there is much more at stake than the gold standard, and I warn its friends here and elsewhere that by their very greed and by this very bill their idol is doomed to its final death—killed in the house of its friends in their servile effort to serve a tyrannical and relentless master.

All laws enforcing tribute to capital are bound to go. Civilization can not carry this mighty load of capitalism much longer and survive. The people will find a way out. Already the cry against every trust is universal in the land. Legislation is being urged by the people providing a graduated tax upon all forms of wealth as the best way to return at least a part of the ill-gotten gains of the rich to the people from whom it is being unjustly taken.

MILLIONS OF SOCIALISTS.

Socialists are multiplying by hundreds of thousands throughout the nation. This bill will recruit their ranks by millions. Their power will soon be felt upon the floor of Congress and in every department of government. They have the true solution of this mighty and growing trust problem. They lay down as their foundation rock the broad principle that all capital for the successful production and distribution of all things necessary to the highest human comfort, mental and social development, which of necessity must be used collectively, shall be owned collectively, and that such property as can best be used individually shall be owned individually. Their cry is, "Public ownership of public utilities." By this simple policy they propose and will forever abolish the bondage of capital and make it serve man, instead of, as now, demand service from man. We are by this very bill unwittingly hastening and making the establishment of socialism an absolute certainty. As one who believes in the fundamental principles of socialism I take a degree of satisfaction in seeing this bill enacted into law, knowing that it will hasten the overthrow of the present system of capitalism it is designed to serve. As it goes down the people will establish in its place a government restored to and used by and for the people. That government will be true socialism. Under this new order, soon to be universally established, every toiler will get more than double pay over present rates, while all interest and tribute to capital will be forever abolished. Our Government railroads will render better service at one-fourth present charges, paying double wages for eight hours' labor. The people everywhere will find ready employment in healthy, well-ventilated factories and mines, each one receiving the full value of his product; our women will enjoy happy homes, while free to choose their occupation, owning and controlling all they produce, while no child will be compelled to work to the sacrifice of its education and health. May God speed the day when all these happy conditions shall be realities. They are all possible and already in sight. To the millions of overburdened and heavy-hearted people I extend congratulations, not because of this legislation, but in spite of it, for its burdens will arouse again the slumbering spirit of liberty and the tyranny of capitalism will be overthrown, while in its stead industrial and social freedom will be established.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I think that this is the only place on this earth where a man is permitted to talk about silver. Up in my State of Michigan the man who would attempt to discuss the money question would empty the hall as quickly as it would be emptied if a smallpox sign were hung over the stage. [Laughter.] With us it is a dead issue.

Guntton instructs us that in the Anaconda mine silver can be produced ready for coinage without expense. The by-products found with it are of sufficient value to pay the cost of mining. In the mines of New South Wales the silver in a dollar may be produced at an expense of 25 cents. The output of these mines is sufficient to meet the world's demand for silver. Under such circumstances it is not possible that gold and silver may be kept together at the ratio of 16 to 1. This being true, it seems to me that no harm can come from a declaration of the real facts. No harm can come from putting into enduring form in our statutes the statement that gold to-day is the real and the only true measure and unit of value.

The Republican party has always stood for advancement. It has always met with courage the duty of the hour. The trouble with our friends on the other side is not that they are sometimes right and sometimes wrong, for I admit that the real Democrats have many times been right. The trouble is, they are never right at the right time. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] They are like a man who sits in a street car with his back in the direction the car is going, with his back turned toward progress. They never see a good thing until they have got by it. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

They are like the boy who for the first time saw an elephant. He said, "Oh, mother, he is going in the wrong direction." [Laughter.] Up in our State the real Democrats, the Democrats who are so oftentimes right, have absolutely perished. They have an alliance up there between Silver Republicans, Silver Democrats, Prohibitionists, and the remnants of the Salvation Army [laughter], all out not for principle but for victory.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any party will ever succeed on wind money. Real money is what we want, and I believe that the real money is gold money. Because it matters not, Mr. Chairman, what nation may stamp the gold coin. It may bear the impress of the weakest or the strongest nation of the world, it is of equal value. We may gather the gold coin from the wreck of the ages, we may take it from the ruins of a nation two thousand years dead, and it is just as true and just as valuable as it was the day it fell shining from the mint that stamped it. That is real money, good money, gold money; and all we ask of men on either side is that they will vote their convictions; vote for the real and the good money. Have the courage of your convictions. Courage is the best word that ever blossomed upon the lips of man. Ernest Renan brushed the dust from a sunken Syrian tomb, laid two thousand years before the Christian era, and he found inscribed thereon one word, and that word told the history of a progressive and a prosperous people. That one word was "Courage!"

If our great party shall ever perish from the earth, and the time shall ever come when her record shall fail to be written among the annals of men, let there be inscribed upon her tomb two words, and let those words be "Courage" and "Integrity." There can be no harm in declaring in this law that an honest people shall pay her honest debts in the best money of its nation.

Our party was ever honest, ever true. I come from the district where this party was born. Under the oaks at Jackson, in nature's cathedral, amid the fragrance of flowers and the songs of birds, our party was born. It was a birth of purity, and pure it will continue, and it will ever stand for the payment of the nation's honest debts in the nation's honest money. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But our friends say that the gold standard breeds trusts. The tariff was the father of trusts, they also say. In a sense our party has led to the trusts. Under the rule of your friend and leader, Mr. Cleveland, who you say should have been put off at Buffalo— [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. And kept off.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. And kept off. There was no claim about trusts. There was no argument that money was too aggressive. Your claim then was that money was cowardly; that it never fought battles; that it went into hiding. The times and the circumstances are such now that money is getting aggressive, it is in the fight, and you claim that it must be restrained. Under our rule you say it goes into trusts, and under your rule it goes into stockings and other hiding places.

Sam Jones tells a story of a man he met the other day, an old free-silver mollusk, as he called him. He said, "Jones, where is all that prosperity you were going to give us?" "Why," said Jones, "it is everywhere. Labor is employed, capital is active, the railroads are overburdened. There is prosperity everywhere." And he said, "It has not struck me yet." Jones said, "It is pretty hard to hit nothing." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care so much to discuss this bill in detail as to talk of the general political situation. I am not at all terrified by the awful Democratic denunciations hurled with such deafening vehemence at this bill and its authors, aiders, and abettors. I have heard Democratic denunciations before, and have long ago learned that whatever the politicians of the Democratic party oppose it is fairly safe for a Republican to favor, for they have opposed every political bill passed by the people and the Republican party in the last forty years. The result is that when I hear the Democrats denouncing any political measure I feel very safe in favoring that measure.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY AN ANTI PARTY.

The Democratic party may be called the "anti" party. They are "anti" this and "anti" that. They are "anti" everything—anti-gold standard, anti-protection, anti-imperialism, anti-trust, anti-expansion, anti-militarism, and even anti-prosperity unless it comes their way.

Years ago it was anti-consolidation, anti-Grantism, anti-resumption, anti-civil rights, anti-centralization, anti-greenbacks, and anti everything the Republican party favored.

As a result the various planks in the Democratic platforms soon get out of fashion and are cast aside like old clothes. The old anti-Grant plank is now down in the Democratic cellar, being used for kindling wood. The anti-resumption plank is now offered at 5 cents on the dollar of its original cost. The anti-greenback plank can not be found at all, and they deny ever having had one. The anti-civil-rights plank is so covered with dust and cobwebs you can not read it. The anti-protection plank is not put to the front any more, and is marked, "Once 100 cents, but now 75 cents," like goods in a store window. The old anti-centralization plank is the only one that they have taken out of their rubbish heap and rubbed up for future use, if needed. Even the 16 to 1 plank, that was above par last year, is now put a little behind the anti-trust and anti-imperialism planks, and is marked, "Only 90 cents—was 105."

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY A DO-NOTHING PARTY.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party is strictly an anti-party. I defy any of them to name a law now on the statute book put there by the Democratic party in the last fifty years that is to-day of any benefit to the American people, and especially to the laboring man. And yet they always in election times and in their speeches pretend that they are the friends of the laboring man.

The Republican party is the great affirmative, progressive party of the country. It has led the way in every forward step our country has taken in the last forty years. It has put on the statute book every law there that benefits the poor man, that builds up commerce, that helps the farmer, that multiplies manufactures, and guards the rights, liberties, and privileges of the American people. The Republican party for forty years has marched at the head of the great American procession, the flag of our country in its right hand, and the band playing "Hail, Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle." The dogs barked and the donkeys brayed, but the procession moved grandly on. [Applause.] It has been well said that the Republican party proposes, the Almighty disposes, and the Democratic party opposes. [Laughter.]

DEMOCRATIC POLITICAL BUGABOOS.

The priests of some religions, doubting their ability to rule their people by appealing to their reason and consciences, resort to methods of terror, and manufacture awful idols and monstrous graven images, and perform various incantations and grotesque dances, attired in robes of terror, with horns on their heads and visages painted in imitation of imaginary monsters.

So the high priests of the Democratic party have for the last forty years been trying to terrify the people with imaginary political bugaboos.

When Lincoln was first a candidate the Democratic high priests got up an awful bugaboo they called "abolitionism," and deceived multiplied thousands of the people.

When Grant was our candidate for the Presidency they manufactured twin bugaboos, called "centralization" and "military despotism," and scared many timid persons into believing that if Grant was elected our liberties would all be taken away from us.

When Hayes was our candidate they paraded before the public the caricature denominated a "bloated bondholder," and tried to make us believe that it was the Republican party in disguise, and that if Hayes was elected the bondholders would take all of our property from us and feed us on husks.

When Garfield was our candidate these high priests of Democracy invented a most fearful bugaboo devil called the "force bill," and terrified the Southern people within an inch of their lives by swearing that if Garfield was elected a vast army would be sent South to hold the elections, and that none but Republicans and negroes would be allowed to vote, and as a consequence the South would be destroyed and life for a Democrat would not be worth living.

When Harrison was last a candidate these same Democratic high priests got together and invented a brand-new lot of frightful bugaboos, whom they denominated "robber barons," and rushed them all over the country to the terror and dismay of millions of innocent and unsuspecting Democrats, and created such an epidemic of apprehension and fear that Cleveland was actually elected President; and now we are told by these same Democratic high priests that Cleveland was a worse devil than all of the awful "robber barons" combined! [Laughter.]

THE GOLDBUG BUGABOO.

When McKinley was our candidate for President three years ago the Democratic bugaboo makers brought out a stupendous crawling monster of antediluvian proportions and branded it a "Goldbug," and swore that it was the Republican party and that if McKinley was chosen President this Paleozoic monster would devour the substance of us Americans as the caterpillar and the palmerworm devoured the crops of the children of Israel in the days of old. These Democratic bugaboo makers actually got up a circus, with William Jennings Bryan as the chief ringmaster and about 10,000 Democratic politicians for clowns and monkeys, and traveled all over the United States, exhibiting this horrible and awe-inspiring "Goldbug," hoping to terrorize the ignorant, to intimidate the cowardly, to demoralize the imaginative, and to create apprehension, if not conviction, in the minds of the thoughtful and the patriotic. Awful were the prophecies indulged in by Bryan and his army of clowns as they exhibited this appalling "Goldbug." Fearful were their contortions of body, face, and gestures as they portrayed the evils that would result from putting the country in possession of this all-devouring "Goldbug."

And although millions were deceived and some of the very elect were led astray, there nevertheless remained enough men, true, patriotic, wise, and brave, to overthrow the army of false prophets, with Bryan at their head, and elect to the Presidency William McKinley, the great advance agent of prosperity, the apostle of sound money, the opener of the mills, the friend of the farmer, and the champion of the American laboring man. And now that awful "Goldbug" manufactured for that great Democratic circus of three years ago is in the back yard of the Democratic junk shop, and on examination it will be found to be composed of nothing but a thin shell of Democratic brass, inflated with Populistic wind. [Laughter.]

A NEW BUGABOO BEING MADE.

And now our Democratic-Populistic adversaries are scratching their heads in an effort to invent a new bugaboo wherewith to scare the people next year. They can be seen almost any day in the Democratic junk yard looking over their old bugaboos to see if they can repair or refit any of them and use them in the next campaign. Some of them are casting lingering looks on the bugaboos of "centralization" and "military despotism," that were used by them to try to scare the people into voting against General Grant; and it is believed that out of these two bugaboos a new one will be made, to be called "imperialism," and it will be ready for use in a short time, with horns upon its head, the claws of a tiger for hands, teeth larger than a lion's, eyes red as blood and as big as saucers, cloven hoofs for feet, and a tail like the very devil's; and with this bugaboo of "imperialism" Bryan will start a new circus, and has already reengaged most of his old clowns and monkey boys. Look out for the show when you see the posters on the trees. [Laughter and applause.] Their next bugaboo will be more terrifying than Barnum's monstrous picture of the great American gyascutus. Next after Barnum, Bryan is the greatest humbug showman the world has ever produced.

The average Democratic politician always carries about him a prodigious variety of misinformation on political subjects. He is almost sure to possess a host of magnificent disqualifications for patriotic statesmanship. Among numerous other equipments he is generally armed with many brilliant intellectual deficiencies for financial discussions. His voice is almost always clothed with what he believes to be thunder, and he shakes his fist as though he thought he could hurl the lightnings of Jove. The result is that when he rushes into the arena of debate he is a most formidable adversary in appearance, and nothing delights him so much as a chance to hurl stupendous predictions of evil and bombard his opponents with terrific denunciations and anathemas, clothed in awful adjectives of the superlative degree; but, fortunately for his opponents, his predictions never hit, and his bombs of denunciation, being filled with nothing but wind, do no harm.

BRYAN'S FALSE PROPHECIES.

Every financial doctrine preached by Bryan and his free-silver apostles three years ago has been proved totally false by the inexorable and irrefutable logic of existing facts. His two great doctrines were that silver and farm products traveled hand in hand, and that if the gold standard was maintained money would become scarcer and prices and wages lower. On these two doctrines hung all of his law and all of his prophecies; but events have repealed his law and falsified his prophecies.

Silver absolutely refused to do what Bryan wanted, and wheat refused to do what silver did. Bryan and his apostles had sworn with a mighty oath that silver and wheat had been wedded in holy wedlock from the foundation of the world, and that they both traveled the same road arm in arm, in lovely and loving companionship, and that when silver fell down wheat fell with it, and that when silver rose up wheat rose also, with a smile upon its face. [Laughter.]

But lo! since Bryan's defeat wheat and silver have had a fearful quarrel, and wheat has taken one end of the road, while silver has taken the other, and now they are far apart and divorced from bed and board, if not absolutely. They seem to have turned their backs upon each other forever. How sad! Wheat seems to have said to silver:

Go, false one, go; I'd rather make
My bower upon some icy lake;
When thawing suns begin to shine,
Than trust to love so false as thine.

[Laughter.]

And silver seems to have said to wheat:

Had we never loved so kindly;
Had we never loved so blindly—
Never met or never parted,
We had ne'er been broken hearted.

SILVER DIVORCED FROM ITS SPOUSES.

Bryan, indeed, insisted that silver was a sort of polygamist and had several wives. Iron was alleged to be one of its wives and cotton another. Whatever road silver traveled, iron and cotton were charged with keeping it company, and Bryan and his free-silver apostles quoted facts and figures and introduced big books and quoted great men to prove that silver was always to be found in company not only with wheat but with iron and cotton, besides several other "old things" too numerous to mention.

But, alas! the course of true love never did run smooth; and now silver has been deserted by not only wheat, that seems to have been its favorite spouse, but by iron, and, what is worse and the most unkindest cut of all, actually deserted by cotton. Iron and cotton have gone up in price, conquering and to conquer, whereas silver has gone down in defeat and disgrace, with none of its sweethearts and mistresses to bear it company, nobody but Bryan and the Democratic party to sit up with it of nights and comfort it on its bed of affliction. [Laughter.] The silver in the American silver dollar is to-day worth only 46 cents, and is only kept at par by the gold in the Treasury and the confidence the business world has in the honesty and statesmanship of the Republican party.

WHAT THE REPUBLICANS HAVE DONE FOR SILVER.

We Republicans have done our best for silver. We passed laws to buy all that was mined in our country; we set our mints to work and coined 500,000,000 silver dollars; we sent commissioners to foreign lands to entreat other nations to join us in keeping silver on its legs; we propped up silver by crutches of gold to keep it going; but in spite of our laws to buy bullion, in spite of our enormous coinage of silver dollars, in spite of our efforts to get other nations to rally to our aid, in spite of our policy to sustain silver with gold, silver has been growing weaker and weaker in the markets of the world; it has been going down, down, down in the scale of price, the demand for it has continued to decrease and grow less until the day has now come when no enlightened nation on God's earth holds up silver as its standard of value, and we, unaided and alone, can not fight its battle against the whole world and hope to win. International bimetalism seems to be forever doomed. It is a beautiful idea, but, like the rainbow, can be seen only in the distance, and moves away from you as fast as you pursue. It is the "iridescent dream" of a financial visionary, and will never be realized in our day. The world is moving on, and we must move with it or get left.

Gold, as a matter of fact and as a matter of business, has been our standard of value for over fifty years. "As good as gold" was the saying of our people whenever the value of any other good money was called in question. And this bill only puts into law what the American people long, long ago put into actual everyday practice. This bill only puts into law what the American people ordered to be put into law when they elected William McKinley President of the United States three years ago, and we would have passed it before had there not been an opposition majority in the Senate.

BRYAN'S FALSE PROPHECIES.

Every prediction made by Bryan and the Democratic party three years ago has been falsified by the inexorable logic of indisputable events. Bryan and his fellow free-silver Democrats predicted that if the gold standard was adhered to the prices of all agricultural products would be so low no farmer could live by farming; that the price of labor would be so low that no laboring man could live by his labor; that money would be so high that no man in debt would be able to borrow it, and as a consequence financial ruin would be his inevitable fate. Bryan predicted that nobody would prosper but bankers; that all manufacturing establishments would either be compelled to close or to give pauper wages to their employees; that our ships would rot at our wharves for want of freights to carry; that many of our railroads would become mere streaks of rusty iron; that universal and irreparable bankruptcy would seize upon the business men of our land, and widespread and unmitigated poverty would be the doom of our people, while starvation and pestilence would stalk abroad through the land like destroying angels, bent on our utter extermination.

Prophet of evil, never hadst thou yet
A cheerful word for me. To mark the signs
Of coming mischief is thy great delight;
Good dost thou ne'er foretell nor bring to pass.

We were told that the Republican party could not be trusted, that all the usurers, all the money sharks, all the bloated bondholders, all the robber barons, all the goldbugs, all the corruptionists, all the enemies of the laboring man, and all the foes of the farmer were in the Republican party, and that if that party elected McKinley as President awful and manifold would be the calamities that would inevitably fall upon the American people, and the salt of liberty would so lose its savor that our very freedom would be like the blazonry of silks and jewels in the gloom of the grave.

PROSPERITY IN SPITE OF PROPHECY.

But out of these nettles of predicted danger have sprung the beautiful blossoms of safety and prosperity. Instead of money becoming scarcer, it has become more plentiful; instead of agricultural products going down to nothing, they have greatly increased in price; instead of laborers' wages being cut down to pauper rates, they have been greatly raised; instead of railroads having nothing to do, they have not enough cars to carry their passengers and freights; instead of our business men being ground to powder in the bankruptcy courts, they have never been happier or more prosperous; instead of our manufacturing establishments closing their doors, all of the old ones are in full blast and new ones are springing up on every hand; instead of poverty and wretchedness stalking through the land like destroying angels—instead, in short, of the vials of Heaven's wrath being poured out upon a God-cursed land, instead of this awful picture of desolation and doom painted by Bryan and the free-silver Democrats as the sure fate of our country if McKinley was elected, what do we behold? A prosperity as fair as a new Jerusalem descended from the skies, a universal acclaim of rejoicing, an era of happiness and good times seldom before experienced by our people, a spirit of progress and enterprise that is carrying our name and our products to markets never visited by us before, and a feeling of grateful contentment as high as the sky, as wide as the earth, and as deep as the sea. [Applause.]

THE GOLD STANDARD A BLESSING.

Bryan, the false prophet of free silver, told us three years ago that under a gold standard the price of all the products of the farm and the factory would go down and the wages of the laboring man would grow less and less and that the man in debt would never be able to pay out, and what Bryan said became the gospel for tens of thousands of Democratic cross-roads orators. But what are the facts? Under the gold standard nothing has gone down in price but silver and the Democratic party. Everything the farmer and manufacturer have to sell has increased in price, and labor is more generally employed and better paid than at any time under Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration. And more, the value of the products of the farm have increased over $600,000,000 and the value of the products of our factories, furnaces, and rolling mills have increased from nine thousand millions in 1890 to twenty thousand millions in 1899, a rate of progress never before made in any country on earth in any period of man's history since the foundation of the world. [Applause.]

Bryan and his apostles of free silver and free trade preached three years ago that if McKinley was elected and the gold standard maintained there would be an awful dearth of money; that greenbacks, national bank notes, silver certificates, and silver dollars would all disappear, and that no money would be left but gold, gold, gold, and that nobody would have any of that but the bankers, the millionaires, the "goldbugs," the "robber barons," and the "bloated bondholders;" that the poor man would never see a gold piece, not even if his eyes were sore, and that a few gold men would be the kings of the land and all the balance of the people no better than serfs and not as good as slaves.

MONEY MORE PLENTIFUL.

And yet what do we find as the fact? Instead of the predictions of Bryan and his free silver apostles proving true, they have proved to be totally false. Instead of money becoming scarce it has become far more plentiful, so that the amount now in circulation is about two thousand million dollars, one-half of which is gold, and the other half paper money and silver, thus giving us more money to the man than we have ever had since Columbus discovered America.

Four years ago the gold money in the United States amounted to five hundred and ninety-seven millions, whereas to-day the amount is over one thousand millions, and the larger proportion of it is in actual circulation, whereas four years ago most of our gold was locked up in the banks or hoarded secretly by the few lucky holders.

In the last four years the money in the hands of the people has increased $620,000,000, and the amount is increasing every day and will continue to increase as long as honest money and honest men are in the land.

Notwithstanding all of Bryan's predictions have proved untrue and all of his doctrines unsound, yet the Democratic party still worship at his shrine. It is a most interesting spectacle to behold the Democratic politician's devotion to Mr. Bryan. He has become a sort of god with many of them, and when you ask them what makes them think so and so, they at once answer, "Bryan says so." In the Old Testament we read, "Thus saith the Lord." But in the new Democratic testament it is, "Thus saith Bryan." The abject devotion of the Democratic party to Bryan reminds me of the implicit faith of the little girl in her mother, when she answered a playmate's denial by saying, "It is so, because my mother says it is so; and what my mother says is so is so, even if it ain't so!" [Laughter.]

REPUBLICAN PROSPERITY IN SPITE OF DEMOCRATIC PREDICTIONS.

In spite of all the prophecies of disaster and starvation made by Bryan and his apostles three years ago, not only are the North, East, and West wonderfully prosperous, and that prosperity increasing every day, but the South is prosperous and is becoming more prosperous all the time.

To hear some of these Southern Democrats talk you would think that the South was a very land of sorrow and poverty; that its people were sitting in darkness robed in sackcloth and ashes, and that no ray of light awoke smiles upon the face of beauty or kindled a gleam in the eye of love. They seem to say to the South—

Affliction is enamored of thy parts,
And thou art wedded to calamity.

Mr. Chairman, I repudiate this picture of the South. It is monstrously false and atrociously unjust. The South to-day is more prosperous, better contented, and more hopeful than at any time since Lee's surrender. Our people are at work and at profitable work, and are happy in their work. Never have we gotten out so many thousand carloads of coal, never have so many hundreds of thousands of tons of pig iron been made, never so many millions of yards of cotton and woolen goods manufactured, never such a demand for our lumber and our marble, never so many men engaged in factory work, never so many people happy over the business outlook. Our farmers are getting good prices for all they have to sell, and our cotton planters, instead of being devoured by imaginary "goldbugs," are secretly thanking God that McKinley was elected and praying that he may be reelected. Like King Agrippa, they are almost persuaded to become Republicans! [Laughter.]

COTTON PLANTERS PROSPEROUS.

Yes, cotton is 7 cents a pound and may go up to 10. It used to be "5-cent cotton." And do you know what 7-cent cotton means? I read from the Chattanooga Times of October 9, 1899, a leading Democratic paper of the central South:

From reports received here it appears that the one thing which has been lacking during the past year to make a well-rounded and general prosperity for the Southern States has come.

Do you hear that, Mr. Chairman? "A well-rounded and general prosperity for the Southern States has come." The South is not being devoured by "goldbugs!" Here is the voice of a leading Democratic paper of the South. Note the headlines: "South's prosperity—The advance in iron had a wonderful effect—But the increase in the price of cotton will make the good times more widespread."

But I read on:

Last year the iron and other industries of the South experienced an unprecedented degree of prosperity, with the exception of the cotton trade. * * * But now the price of cotton is advancing in a remarkable way. The staple is now selling at a higher price than at any time this year or last. * * * If the present high rate continues, it will mean millions of dollars to the Southern farmers and dealers and, through them, a fine prosperity to all interests in the South. * * * To state the same fact in figures, the advance in cotton, if the price ruling last week holds, as it probably will, means that Southern planters will receive at least $75,000,000, possibly $100,000,000, more for this year's crop than for that of last year.

THE SOUTH HAS PROSPERITY.

And cotton has not only gone to 7 cents, but is fast crawling up to 8, and this will mean largely over $100,000,000 added to the wealth of the South in a single year from one item alone. Considering that, according to the Times, "the iron and other industries of the South experienced an unprecedented degree of prosperity," it is no wonder that newspaper, Democratic though it be, was forced by an honest outburst of enthusiasm to exclaim—

The one thing [7-cent cotton] which has been lacking during the past year to make a well-rounded and general prosperity for the Southern States has come!

Yes, Mr. Chairman, "a well-rounded and general prosperity for the Southern States has come."

I could read from other Southern Democratic papers to the same effect, but will content myself by reading an extract from a South Carolina paper, the Columbia State. It says:

Never before in this country has there been a time of such push and enterprise in the towns as we have now, and as a natural consequence never before has there been such rapid growth as the towns in our State are making to-day. * * * This is going to be a great year for Columbia.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, not only "a great year" for Columbia, S. C., but a great year for that greater Columbia which is our whole country. [Applause.] Everywhere throughout the South the bells of joy are ringing in the hearts of the masses of the people. Only the Democratic politicians are unhappy. There are certain weeds that seem to grow only on the refuse heaps in our back yards and in low places, and so Democratic politicians in the South sometimes flourish best where there is most rubbish and most ruins and under cloudy skies, whereas the sun of prosperity causes them to wither and to fade.

PROSPERITY IN TENNESSEE.

We are wonderfully prosperous all through the South. In my district the output of the coal mines is only limited by the capacity of the railroads to haul it away. Our furnaces and rolling mills are all in full blast, our marble quarries are shipping enormous quantities of our beautiful marbles all over the land, our lumber mills are all at work, our cotton and woolen mills are doing better than ever before, all of our other factories are running to their full capacities, our merchants are doing a most gratifying business, new enterprises are being constantly started or projected, our railroads have not sufficient rolling stock to move our freights, money is more plentiful than for years, the farmers are getting good prices for all they have to sell, and the laboring classes are all employed. Not even our Democrats, few and far between as they are and possessed of magnifying eyes to a marvelous degree as they seem to be, can find any fault, and if it were not for the offices it is safe to say that nine out of every ten of them would renounce the Democratic party and all its works and join the Republican hosts amid glad hosannas of praise and thanksgiving. [Laughter and applause.]

And I say here boldly that a very large proportion of the business men of the South—Democratic business men, I mean—are in favor of this bill. In their private and business talks they utter Republican sentiments, they favor a protective tariff and a gold standard—yes, and are for national expansion also, and tens of thousands of them would vote the Republican ticket if that awful bugaboo of "negro supremacy" did not stand between them and the ballot box.

THE SOUTH FULL OF HOPE AND NOT DESPAIR.

The South is no region of despair, overarching by a starless sky. Its gateway is no battle-scarred, prisonlike iron door, with a rusty lock and a clanking chain, surrounded by tottering walls and thunder-blasted trees, bearing on its archway the inscription Dante saw over the gate of hell—

All hope abandon, ye who enter here.

On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, the gateway to the South is as fair as the entrance to Eden; its pillars of grand proportions, wreathed about with flowering vines; its surroundings suggestive of beauty, happiness, and enterprise, where "every prospect pleases" and nothing vile can be found, and on its gorgeous archway, in letters of shining gold and artistic form, these words:

The Southland, earth's new Eden,
Blessed are they who enter here.

And when you enter, hope will be your guide, fortune will be your opportunity and success your crown of reward.

Nowhere are there such grand inducements for the intelligent investment of capital; nowhere such a splendid future for enterprise and industry; nowhere such magnificent business prospects as in this superb region of the South, the garden of the world.

THE ENORMOUS GROWTH OF BUSINESS.

To show the stupendous increase in the business of the United States I call attention to the clearing-house reports, which show that their business for 1896 aggregated thirty-seven thousand million dollars, while their business for 1899 aggregates sixty-nine thousand million dollars; so that for every $100 paid in 1896 $196 were paid in 1899, thus showing that the business of our country to-day is nearly twice as great as it was when McKinley was elected President.

Another unerring evidence of the enormous increase of business is the fact that money orders issued by the post-offices of the United States have increased more than $20,000,000 a year.

The Agricultural Department estimates that the value of farm animals in the United States has increased in the last two years $342,000,000, which is just that much more in the hands of our farmers.

And, wonder of wonders, we are now shipping to foreign lands more than $1,000,000 worth of manufactured goods every day in the year, our total exports of all kinds, breadstuffs and meats included, amounting to over one thousand million dollars for this good year of 1899.

And all this marvelous growth has been accomplished while William Jennings Bryan and his horde of Democratic politicians have been going to and fro in the earth and up and down in it, preaching 16 to 1 and filling the land with predictions about the tremendous and appalling calamities sure to come upon the country because of the gold standard and the protective tariff of the Republican party. The Democratic politicians howl and bark, but the procession moves on all the same with the Republican party at its head and McKinley as its great captain. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATS ADMIT WE ARE PROSPEROUS.

Many Democratic politicians admit the country is prosperous; they admit it because they are obliged to admit it; they admit it with awfully wry faces; but they admit it nevertheless. They hold the admission in their mouths as long as possible, but all you have to do is to fish for it with a direct question and you will hook it on the point of your interrogation and draw it forth.

The fact that our country is prosperous has been admitted by the great Democratic newspapers all over the country. It has been admitted by the great Democratic leaders on the floor of this House. It is the one great, indisputable, magnificent fact of the year 1899. It is grandly apparent all over the land. It shines in the towns and cities. It is apparent on every well-managed farm. It gleams in the eyes of the laboring man. It roars in every factory. It bursts forth in smoke and flame from every smokestack. It thunders along every railroad with its loaded trains and laboring locomotives. It cuts the waters of lake, river, and ocean in front of every steamboat and steamship. It inspires happy songs in all the cotton and corn fields of the South, and all the hives of human industry in the North. It lifts the mortgage from the humble home and makes glad its inmates. It fills our schools with merry children and crowds our colleges with studious youths. It fills the whole land with blessedness as the waters fill the great deeps of the ocean, and inspires hope in many a heart that had long harbored the black vulture of despair. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATIC EXPLANATIONS OF OUR PROSPERITY.

And the great business now of Democratic politicians is trying to show that this prosperity is not the result of Republican policies and Republican administration. Some of them say that our present great prosperity is the result of an accident! I am sorry that this sort of accident did not happen under the last Democratic Administration. Some say that our prosperity is due to the Spanish and Philippine wars. But our prosperity had sprouted and was growing rapidly before either of these wars began.

Some say that our present extraordinary prosperity is caused by the enormous amount of gold mined in the world. But if that be so, it is only a fulfillment of the predictions of the Republican party that there would be enough gold mined and minted to do the business of the world. And, finally, we have heard a prominent Democratic member on this floor rise in his place and ask the question whether the Republican party or the Almighty is the author of our great prosperity. Uncle Mose, an old negro preacher, was once asked by a Democratic orator in Virginia if the Almighty and not the Republicans did not free the negro. "Yes," replied Uncle Mose, scratching his gray head, "I s'pose the Almighty did do it, but these Republicans helped Him a heap, I tell you." [Laughter.]

The Almighty always blesses those who work in accordance with His eternal laws of reason and righteousness, and the reason the country is more prosperous under Republican rule than under Democratic rule is that the Republicans conform their policies and legislation to the eternal verities of the Almighty, instead of pandering to the passions and prejudices of sections and special interests. We have been told from our boyhood that honesty is the best policy. The Republican party has builded its financial house on this rock, and the gates of hell and the Democratic party will never prevail against it. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATS EXPERTS IN EXPLANATION.

The Democratic politicians are great explainers. Indeed, they are the very best explainers in the world. They are experts in explanation. They have had more experience in explaining than any other people in the world, personal, political, or professional. It is true that they generally—

Puzzle by their explanations
And darken by their elucidations.

Nevertheless, the strong point with the average Democratic politician is his capacity for explanation and elucidation.

And now they are trying to explain the high price of agricultural products, especially cotton and stock; they are trying to explain the advance in wages and the increase in price of iron and steel; they are trying to explain the enormous increase in the bulk of business; they are doing their best to elucidate how it is that the ratio in value between gold and silver has gone down from 16 to 1 to 34 to 1, notwithstanding their assertion four years ago that the Almighty had made the ratio 16 to 1 and it was not in the power of man to change it!

I heard of a Democrat who was throwing up to a Republican that McKinley's election had not kept wheat up to a dollar. "I know that," said the Republican, "but you Democrats don't understand things. McKinley don't work in the same line all the time. He first worked in wheat, then he worked in iron, and now he is working in cattle, horses, and cotton." [Laughter.] So McKinleyism helps everybody. [Applause.]

McKINLEY'S ADMINISTRATION COMPARED WITH CLEVELAND'S.

I do not wish to close my remarks, Mr. Chairman, without drawing some contrasts between the Administration of President Cleveland and the Administration of President McKinley. Cleveland, you know, was supposed to be a sort of Democratic god. He was believed to be perfect, and could do no wrong. He set himself up as the champion of free trade, and under his Administration free trade was given a fair trial, and you know, and the American people know, with what result.

Under Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration we had to sell bonds to get money to run the Government, while under McKinley's Republican protection and gold-standard Administration we have such a surplus of money in the Treasury that we are using it to pay off our bonds and thus decrease the national debt.

Under Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration we bought millions of pounds of steel and iron from foreign lands, while under McKinley's Republican protection and gold-standard Administration we are selling millions of pounds of steel and iron in foreign lands, and are building steel bridges in Europe, Asia, Africa, and South America, to the astonishment of the balance of the world.

Under the last year of Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration the total imports and exports of the United States were thirteen hundred million dollars, while under the last year of McKinley's Republican protection and gold-standard Administration the total imports and exports have reached the enormous aggregate of two thousand million dollars.

Under Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration the farmers of the United States managed to live only by mortgaging their farms and sacrificing their stock, while under McKinley's Republican protection and gold-standard Administration the farmer's have got such good prices for their products and stock that many have been able not only to live comfortably but to pay themselves out of debt.

FREE TRADE VS. PROTECTION AND THE GOLD STANDARD.

Under Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration it became necessary to borrow $262,000,000 to obtain gold wherewith to maintain the gold reserve and pay the current expenses of the Government, and that, too, while we were at peace with all the world, while under McKinley's Republican protection and gold-standard Administration we have millions of gold in the Treasury and have paid many millions of our indebtedness besides, and that, too, while carrying on two great wars, one requiring over 200,000 additional troops and the other requiring 75,000 more, besides immense enlargements in our naval forces and twenty millions paid for the Philippines and three millions paid the Cuban soldiers. [Applause.]

Under Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration there were such multitudes of laboring men thrown out of employment by the Democratic free-trade hard times that it was necessary to open houses where they and their children could get soup and bread to save them from starvation, while under McKinley's Republican protection and gold-standard Administration laboring men get plenty of work at good wages, and many of them are not only supporting their families and schooling their children, but are saving up money for the future. [Applause.]

THE DEMOCRATIC WAR ON SHEEP AND AMERICAN TIN.

Under Cleveland's Democratic free-trade Administration war was declared against the American sheep, and the price of American wool became so low that hundreds of thousands of our sheep were slaughtered because it was unprofitable to keep them, while under McKinley's Republican protection gold-standard Administration the American sheep has been befriended, American wool has doubled in price, and the sheep have immensely increased in number and value.

The free-trade Democrats swore by Grover Cleveland and all their other gods that we could not make tin plate in this country, and if we did the price would be so high that a poor man would not be able to buy a coffeepot or tin cup, and that the price of all canned goods would be enormously increased, whereas under Republican protection tariffs over three thousand million pounds of tin have been manufactured in the United States and the price is one-fourth less than it was when the McKinley bill was passed. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATIC POLITICIANS AND RICH MEN.

The Democratic politicians seem to be anxious to destroy all the rich men in the land who are Republicans. They would inaugurate a general and indiscriminate massacre of them all. It seems to be no crime for a man to be rich if he is a Democrat; but if he is a Republican he should be tried by drumhead court-martial and shot at once.

Where there is great prosperity there are apt to be some rich men who will profit by it; but while trying to prevent anybody becoming rich you may prevent the country from becoming prosperous.

I once heard of a half-witted negro boy whose duty it was to keep the flies off his master while he slept. The boy grew tired of his task, and, seeing a great many flies on his master's face, got a big rock and, creeping up softly, threw it with great violence against his master's face. He killed a great many of the flies, but he killed his master also. So these Democrats pass laws to kill off the rich, but in so doing they kill prosperity also. We had a sample of this when Cleveland was President. [Applause.] Where the carcass is there will the eagles be also, and where there is blood there will be bloodsuckers; but is it not better to have blood and some bloodsuckers than to have no blood and no bloodsuckers?

PROSPERITY IN SPITE OF DEMOCRATIC DENUNCIATIONS.

And thus it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that all of the predictions of the Democratic party for the last forty years have proved untrue and all of their denunciations have proved undeserved. This being so, their predictions and denunciations now fail to have any effect on me, and I do not believe they will have any effect on the country. They are the same predictions and denunciations the Democrats make in every campaign. In their sight we Republicans are always very bad men, always belong to the wicked and corrupt money sharks, and are always in a conspiracy to ruin the American people. In their own sight the Democratic politicians are always patriots without guile, always honest and wise, and always trying to rescue the people from the remorseless grasp of the money power.

But we will find one year from now, after this bill has become a law, that all of these Democratic predictions of evil are just as false as all of their former predictions have proved to be. We will find one year from now that our country will still be prosperous, that the people still have confidence in us, and that with McKinley chosen President for a second term, and a strong Republican majority in both Houses of Congress, Bryanism and free silver will be forever things of the past, and the verdict of impartial history will be that the United States of America, as the foremost nation of all the world, will owe its exalted position to the wisdom, the patriotism, the honesty, the courage, and the enterprise of the Republican party. [Applause.]

Mr. BREAZEALE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to record in the name of Louisiana her protest against the passage of this most iniquitous measure. I use that word advisedly. It is iniquitous not only in its provisions, but it is iniquitous in its treachery to the American people. Scarcely three years ago some 13,000,000 people, almost the entire voting strength of the American people, registered their ballots in favor of bimetalism. The Democratic party in its national platform spoke out strong and sharp for silver; in unmistakable terms it demanded that the money of this country should be gold and silver in the ratio of 16 to 1. Some 6,000,000 people voted for the inauguration of that system. They adopted the true American doctrine, the true American principle, that this country was grand enough and great enough to inaugurate that system without the assistance of any other country or nation on the face of God's green earth.

The Republican platform announced the doctrine that they favored bimetalism, but upon the pitiful, puny plea that we were not great and strong and powerful enough to inaugurate that system unless we had the help of the European nations; and it remained for a poor little handful of so-called Democrats—some 180,000—to vote squarely and plainly for the gold system.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that out of the entire vote cast three years ago only this pitiful 180,000 or 200,000 favored the gold system as the monetary system of this great Republic. The remaining 13,000,000 favored bimetalism. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, you have no warrant from the American people for the passage of this measure. On the contrary, you have the absolute statement by the people themselves that they favored bimetalism; and to-day you propose to carry through this measure and choke it down the throats of the American people, because you have seen the handwriting on the wall and know that unless you do it to-day this is your last chance and you will never have the opportunity again to do it.

You take advantage of this wave of prosperity now, believing that you can pass this measure and that there will be nothing said about it at the approaching election by the American people. But I say, Mr. Chairman, that you are counting without your host. Lay not the flattering unction to your soul that you can commit this crime with impunity. The American people have never forgiven treachery; and if this be not treachery of the most damnable kind, I do not know what it is.

Now, passing from the general aspect of the bill to its provisions, show me, I ask you, where you will find any such unwarranted power was ever given or was ever proposed to be given in this House as is given by this bill to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury is vested with such absolute power that it appalls any thoughtful, any patriotic, man to contemplate. Think for a second what power section 4 of the bill confers upon the Secretary of the Treasury of this great country. It invests him with authority to maintain the gold reserve, which I understand will be about $120,000,000, by the issuance of bonds at his sweet will and at the dictates of his judgment.

Without restriction, without safeguard, the unlimited power is vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to pile up the bonded debt of the nation as his judgment, good, bad, or indifferent, may dictate. The fathers who framed the organic law contemplated no such violation of this spirit. They intended no such power to be vested in any one man, and this most extraordinary grant of authority to the Secretary of the Treasury will receive the unanimous condemnation of the people in 1900.

Mr. Chairman, no less objectionable is that section of the bill which increases the power of the national banks. The existing laws on this subject are bad enough in all conscience, but under the terms of this act the Government surrenders her rights to control the monetary system of the nation to the tender mercies of the national banks, which, under the extraordinary power granted by this act, can inflate and contract the currency of the nation at will. In my humble judgment this is a crime of the worst character and unequalled in the history of this Republic.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this measure is a complete surrender by the Government to the money power of the nation and furnishes the completed evidence of the charge that the Republican party owed its success in 1896 to the money power and to-day is paying the debt contracted in that election.

I thank God, Mr. Chairman, that it is not the Democratic party that is guilty of this crime, of this treachery. I thank God, sir, that it is not the Democratic party that seeks to chain this nation, like Prometheus to the rock, that the money power may plunge its golden talons into its quivering vitals and gorge itself on the sufferings of the people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I will plant my feet in the footprints of the fathers, where there is no danger of stumbling or going astray. The purposes of the present bill are apparent. The first section declares and establishes the single gold standard. The second section makes all obligations, public and private, payable in gold only. The third section establishes in the Treasury Department a division to be known as the division of "issue and redemption." The fourth section is a command upon the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve, or redemption fund, and gives him unlimited and unconditional power for that purpose to issue and sell bonds of the United States, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 3 per cent, payable in gold coin, at the end of twenty years, but reserving the right in the Government to redeem them after one year. Also, that all greenbacks and notes issued under the act of 1890, and known as Sherman notes, when received into the Treasury, shall not be reissued except for gold, and that silver certificates shall not be reissued in denominations above $5.

The remainder of the bill extends the power of national banks and authorizes them to receive from the Government the par value of the bonds deposited in currency notes, and greatly reduces the tax against the banks. These are but the general features of the bill, but the bill in its entire scope and meaning is revolutionary, and means a complete change in our monetary affairs. The second section of the bill uses the following language:

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section [gold].

The interest-bearing bonded indebtedness of the United States is $1,046,000,000, all payable in coin (gold or silver). If this bill passes, all these bonds will thereafter be payable in gold only. Now, if Mr. Cleveland's statement holds good, and he spoke by authority, this will increase the value of these outstanding bonds in the sum of $261,500,000, which means that that vast sum of money is to be taken out of the pockets of the people by legislation and presented to the bondholders as a gift from the honest and industrious people of the country. And yet gentlemen on the other side boast of Republican integrity and friendship for the masses of the people. May Heaven spare my people from such friendship.

This section of the bill is a fraud on the taxpayers of this country. Every bond of the United States is payable in coin, either gold or silver, and this section of the bill changes the contract and requires the Government to pay them in gold only. It is a dishonest concession to the bondholder, one they do not deserve and one they should not have. It is an iniquity upon the people that should not be perpetrated.

When Cleveland sold $52,000,000 in bonds, before doing so, in a special message to Congress, he stated that if Congress would authorize gold bonds to be sold instead of the coin bonds then authorized by law that the Government would gain by so doing $16,000,000. In other words, the $52,000,000 of bonds payable in gold would be worth $16,000,000 more than if payable in coin.

And, Mr. Chairman, this same principle will affect the entire mortgage indebtedness of the country, corporate, municipal, and private, and will cost the debtors of the country countless millions more than they contracted to pay. For them to pay less than they owe would be dishonest and to compel them to pay more is extortion.

In a speech which I had the honor to deliver in this House in March, 1898, upon this subject, in giving a history of the conduct of the creditors of the Government I made the following statement, which I repeat here:

"Mr. Speaker, a history of the concessions already made by this Government to its creditors is enough to bleach with shame the cheeks of every man who loves fair dealings and approves of common honesty. First, the depreciated currency at the close of the war was bought up by speculators at a discount ranging from 40 to 60 per cent and exchanged for the bonds of the Government at full face value. These bonds were payable in the lawful money of the United States.

"On March 16, 1869, a law was passed making these bonds payable in coin, without any additional consideration being paid to the Government. The greenbacks at that time were good enough for the citizen, the merchant, and the soldier, but the debts due the bondholders were made payable in coin. Ever restless, ever grasping, these creditors secured the passage of the act of 1870, and after its provisions were put in force they were securely entrenched with all their holdings. At this time the bonded debt of the Government was largely owned in foreign countries.

"Not satisfied with this liberal treatment on the part of the Government, not satisfied with doubling their investments, but inspired by their greed and encouraged by their successful plundering of the people, they and their allies set on foot the conspiracy which resulted in the demonetization of silver in 1873. And, Mr. Chairman, no conspiracy to overthrow a kingdom or plunder its people was ever pursued to consummation with more secrecy and less regard for human rights. And yet these people and their mouthpieces upon this floor declare with apparent candor that it would be 'repudiation and dishonor' to pay these bonds in the money of the contract.

"To me, Mr. Chairman, the failure of the Government to enforce the terms of this contract would be treason against the Government and a repudiation of the rights of the sovereign people. This, Mr. Chairman, is my opinion now and will be as long as I believe in the integrity of contracts and the right of the debtor to discharge his contract as he agreed to do."

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I could not be just either to myself or the patriotic and industrious people I have the honor to represent should I fail to oppose by all honorable means the passage of this bill. I know in advance that any arguments that may be advanced on this side of the House, it matters not how sound and conclusive they may be, will not be heeded by those on the other side, who have surrendered in advance the birthright of the people to the money changers and bondholders of the country.

The very first section of the bill declaring and establishing the single gold standard in the United States bodes greater evil to the agricultural and laboring classes of this country—indeed, to the nation itself—than any legislation that has heretofore been boldly proposed by a great political party.

Those of us who have continuously and persistently urged upon Congress the justice and right of the equal coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 have been met at every point by the argument that the agitation of the money question disturbed the business interests of the country, and that it ought not to be done; that if we would only let the money question rest prosperity and happiness stood ready to bless every home in the land. And how these very men who have pressed with such earnestness these arguments are no sooner in control of Congress and the Executive than they begin the agitation of the money question in the most radical manner.

You propose by this bill in the most defiant way to establish in this country gold monometallism as completely as legislation can do it.

In the beginning of this conspiracy (I can not call it by any other name) against the industrial and producing classes of this country nothing was done openly. The people were deceived and misled at every step. The act demonetizing silver passed in 1873 came like a thief at night, and was not understood by the people for years after its passage. And after it was known and understood by the people, and as late as 1888, the Republicans in their national platform declared "that the Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money."

And in 1892 you declared in your national platform "that the American people from tradition and interest favored bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money." Such were the declarations of the Republican party. When it was charged by a deceived and injured people that it was in favor of the gold standard, it was denied on stump and in platform. Now you step out into the open and propose to establish by law the gold standard and to make all obligations, both public and private, payable in gold only.

Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of the discussion of the silver question in recent years, every man almost who opposed the free coinage of silver at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1 did so protesting that he was a bimetalist and a greater friend of silver than those who favored free coinage. I remember very well in my first race for Congress that when I would charge my Republican opponent and his party with being "gold bugs" and in favor of the single gold standard, they would grow indignant in their denials and protest their friendship for silver. They were then either deceived themselves or attempting to deceive the people. Where will they stand now that the issue is unmasked? My predictions then are now demonstrated. I stand to-day where I stood then, opposed to banks of issue, opposed to the single gold standard, and in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the present legal ratio. And if this bill passes it will bear the prints of sorrow. It may not come to-day nor to-morrow, but come it will as certain as the years roll on.

This means that all the debts and commercial transactions of the country must rest upon gold for their final payment. Gold being the standard will in fact, as well as law, should this bill pass, be the only money of final payment.

I think, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that we might profit by a comparison of the amount of gold we will have with the amount of debts we must pay. The following estimate of our debts will be found to be substantially correct:

Present interest-bearing bond indebtedness.

Bonded debt of the United States	$1,300,000,000
Bonded debt of railroads	5,665,000,000
Mortgage debt, secured on real estate (census of 1890)	6,019,000,000
Bonds issued by organized industrial trusts, not less than	4,000,000,000
State, municipal, and other corporate bonded debt, more than	1,000,000,000

Giving a total of $18,000,000,000 in round numbers. Interest on this vast sum at 5 per cent will amount to $900,000,000 per year; which must be paid annually or at shorter periods.

In addition to this taxes were collected last year as follows:

Customs	$206,000,000
Internal revenue	273,000,000
Total	479,000,000

Making a grand total of corporate and national debts and taxes to be paid annually of $1,378,000,000. The amount of gold and gold certificates now in circulation, as shown by the Treasurer's report, is $762,244,252, about one-half as much as the national taxes and interest on the national and corporate indebtedness for one year, and only one twenty-fifth of the debt as shown above.

In addition to this our commercial transactions in the United States in one year will amount to more than $70,000,000,000, so that this vast annual charge, as well as our vast commercial transactions, must rest upon the narrow basis of about $700,000,000 in money of final payment.

Much of this debt is held abroad, and the money for its payment may have to be drawn from our small supply of gold and shipped to foreign countries to meet these demands.

The $90,000,000 of bullion certificates can no longer be used for this purpose, not even in the payment of private contracts. The $346,000,000 of greenbacks can not be used in the payment of these; they must be paid in gold. But, Mr. Chairman, this is not all. The bill does not stop here, but it establishes a bureau of "issue and redemption." This bureau, Mr. Chairman, is a jail in which to confine the bullion certificates, issued under the Sherman law, and the greenbacks, from which they will never be released. It is only an indirect way of permanently retiring the greenbacks, amounting to $346,000,000, and Treasury notes of 1890, amounting to $90,000,000, and converting the $400,000,000 of silver certificates into denominations of $5 and less.

This money of the people, representing the credit and sovereignty of the Government, is to be retired from circulation and the volume of our currency contracted more than $400,000,000. This greenback, which was a stay to the nation in time of war and that has contributed so much to the convenience and happiness of the people, is not only to meet its death, but must die from perpetual imprisonment in the division of "issue and redemption."

Not only that, but the Secretary of the Treasury will have the power under this bill to redeem the silver dollars in gold, thus completely destroying the legal-tender quality of all money except gold, and instead of having legal-tender silver dollars as money, they will constitute a charge against the gold redemption fund. So we will have greenbacks, silver, Treasury notes of 1890, and currency certificates, amounting in all to about $950,000,000, all redeemable in gold, that may be, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, redeemed, and gold bonds issued, if necessary, for every dollar with which to redeem them. Such a proposition, to my mind, Mr. Chairman, is not only monstrous but criminal. [Applause on Democratic side.]

But let us go a step further. We have seen, as stated before, that the total amount of gold belonging to the people is $762,244,252. Under this bill a reserve fund of at least one hundred and fifty millions must be maintained by the Government. Under the present law national banks are required also to keep a reserve fund, which on the 7th day of September, 1899, amounted to $630,789,147, which is $18,544,925 more than all the gold in the United States belonging to the people. So with the silver money and certificates and the greenbacks out of the way, the national banks will have an absolute monopoly of the currency of the country.

Mr. Chairman, we hear much of trusts and monopolies these days. The people are being robbed and plundered in every direction—the Standard Oil trust and the sugar trust laying tribute upon every home in the land; the beef trust raising the price of meat until it will take a bushel of wheat or 2 bushels of corn to pay for a respectable beefsteak.

The Federal Steel Company, with a capital of $200,000,000; the American Steel and Wire Company, which have in the last few months arbitrarily advanced the price of their products from 50 to 150 per cent. And this is only a few of the unlawful combinations that are ruthlessly plundering the people. These corporations and trusts that have amassed these great fortunes, not by labor and toil, but by favoritism and protection under the law, now filch from the people their hard-earned dollars, and defy them, and ignore and override the laws made for their control.

They have destroyed many villages and towns by buying up and otherwise closing independent factories. They have turned the laborer back from their closed doors and smokeless furnaces. Already they have discharged more than a hundred thousand commercial travelers, and are fast reducing the remaining number. They not only control the price of many articles of commerce, but dictate to the retail merchant what price he shall make to his customers. Large department houses are fast taking the place of the smaller retail merchants. In fact, they are becoming the masters; all others, the servants.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, in the face of this situation, blind to the teachings of the past, and unmindful of the oppressions of the people, the present Administration proposes to put this bill through Congress under the gag rule, with limited debate, to charter the greatest trust known to the world—the banking trust—and give to it unlimited power over the currency of the country; power to expand or contract the currency at will; power not only over the business of the country, but power to destroy the country.

The great banking houses in New York will be the headquarters for this trust, and the smaller banks throughout the country will be but the satellites and lieutenants of this great institution to carry out its orders. And the division of "issue and redemption" established by this bill will be the signal station for this trust and for the gamblers and stockbrokers throughout the country.

And, Mr. Chairman, if this signal station should sound the alarm, then banks under the operation of this bill could in a few days paralyze the business of this country. Who is it that does not remember the panic of 1893? The banks called in all their loans, and no man could borrow a dollar. The country was without means to carry on its business. Labor was unemployed, and commerce was at a standstill, and how much more severe may be the stroke under this bill.

THE NATIONAL BANKS THE POWER BEHIND THE THRONE.

On October 31, 1899, there were 3,601 national banks in the United States, with an authorized capital stock of $608,528,045. And these banks had on deposit with the Treasurer $232,463,160 in bonds and $5,562,170 lawful money as a security for their circulation. Under the law as it now stands, the national banks may deposit with the Treasurer of the United States United States bonds and receive in bank currency 90 per cent of their par value.

Under the present bill, if it should become a law, they can receive a dollar in bank currency for every dollar in bonds so deposited. When the bonds are so deposited the bank not only receives the full par value of the bonds in bank currency, but the Government pays to the banks all interest accruing on the bonds so deposited. So if a bank should deposit in the Treasury $100,000 in bonds bearing 3 per cent interest, the Government would pay the bank $3,000 a year interest on its bonds, and turn over to the bank, in addition thereto, $100,000 in bank currency, to be loaned to the people at whatever rate of interest they could secure.

These bonds and this currency are free from the burdens of taxation that often bears so heavily upon other property. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I will indulge for a few minutes in a brief review of the history of banks of issue. The history of the old United States Bank, which was chartered in the early days of the Republic, was so conspicuous for its evil effects upon the country that it ought to suffice to render the name national bank forever odious to the American people. Its record for criminal conduct against the people and the Government was and still remains without a parallel. Its evil effects upon the finances of the country were most disastrous.

Jackson, seeing its baleful effects, determined to save the Government by destroying the bank. And in one of the most memorable political contests in history he destroyed the bank and saved the Government. The next banking act was passed by Congress in 1864, in the midst of the civil war; but even then the effort was made to conceal the name and real purposes of the act. So the bill was passed with this significant title: "To provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation thereof."

The acts of 1791 and 1816, chartering the United States Bank, plainly stated in the title the purpose of the act, but neither the title nor the act of 1864 disclosed the name "bank;" on the contrary, the companies chartered by it were called "associations." This was done for the evident purpose of concealing from the people the fact that national banks had been established. And no sooner had they been established than they began a war against the greenbacks which has been kept up until this good day. In 1874 this charter act was amended, and was entitled "The national bank act," which act the bill under consideration seeks to amend.

There is, Mr. Chairman, and ever will be a ceaseless conflict between banks of issue and money coined or issued by the Government, for the reason that every dollar of money that can be destroyed or withdrawn from circulation makes room for as many dollars of bank money. Or, to state the proposition in another way, if there were sufficient money in circulation to meet all the demands of trade, bank money would have no place in our financial system; but if all or a part of the money necessary to meet the demands of trade be wanting, then bank money comes into use.

This conflict, Mr. Chairman, has ever been the disturbing element in our financial system and will continue to be until the banks are destroyed or until they become the supreme masters of the Government and the people.

It was the banks that determined upon the destruction of the greenbacks. It was the banks that forced the contests against silver. And if this bill shall become a law they will be complete victors over the Constitution and the people. The free coinage of gold and silver in this country never would have been interrupted but for the influence upon our finances of the banks and their allies, the bondholders.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is no new contest. It is but the same contest that has been waged since the foundation of the Government, in one form or the other, by special and privileged classes seeking to seize the powers and functions of the Government and then appropriate them to their own use. This same power has levied taxes upon our people for the benefit of the favored ones.

It has secured in the past to favorites of the Government land grants of more than 200,000,000 acres of the public domain. This same power wrung from the hands of the Supreme Court of the United States a decision declaring the income-tax law unconstitutional, overturning the decisions of that court for a century, thus relieving the wealth of the country from the burdens of taxation.

And, Mr. Chairman, the effort to pass this bill is but the same old conflict waged against the money of the country by private banking corporations and the bondholding element of the country, seeking to deprive the Government of its highest sovereignty—that of its power to issue and coin money for the benefit of the people—and appropriate that power for their own gain.

These banks, Mr. Chairman, have a most cunning way of transacting their business. To illustrate: On September 7, 1899, the liabilities of the national banks on account of deposits were $3,031,463,016—five times as much as their paid-up capital; and on the same day they had loans and overdrafts outstanding amounting to $2,500,000,000—more than four times as much as their capital stock and one and one-half times more money than all the money in the United States. So it may be seen that they were loaning at interest, at one time, all the money they had and all that everybody else had and a thousand million dollars more than all the money in all the country.

If, Mr. Chairman, these corporations under existing law can, by the use of certificates of deposit and checks, or by some sort of necromancy in bookkeeping, manage to collect interest on all the money in the country, what may they not do if given the extended privileges contained in this bill? How long will it be until these grasping and insatiate corporations will not only control but own the country?

How apt are the words of Jackson at this point. In speaking of the old United States Bank he said:

The bold effort the present bank has made to control the Government, the distress it has wantonly produced, are but premonitions of the fate that awaits the American people should they be deluded into a perpetuation of this institution or the establishment of another like it.

And what impelled the immortal Jefferson to most solemnly declare that "I sincerely believe that banking institutions are more dangerous than standing armies"? These solemn statements, made by these, the two greatest statesmen and patriots known to American history, ought to be a sufficient warning to cause this Congress to hesitate long before taking the fatal step.

This is not all, Mr. Chairman. The passage of this bill means the indefinite postponement of the payment of our national bonded debt, as well as its enlargement. The banks must have the bonds, and their influence will be sufficient to extend their payment indefinitely. And as they may need more bonds the finances will be so manipulated by them as to compel their issue. And from year to year we will go on paying millions of dollars in interest without any promise of relief.

But this is not all. We have promise of much more legislation by this Congress not in the interest of the people. The Payne-Hanna ship-subsidy bill is to be brought before Congress for consideration, and we have been informed that orders have been issued that it must pass. By its terms the people are to be taxed from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000 annually, to be given as a bonus to the shipowners of the country. The standing Army is to be largely increased, to see, I suppose, that the trusts and combines are not molested while plundering the people.

I had some hope, Mr. Chairman, when I came to this Congress that the Republican majority would consent to some legislation in the interest of the great army of honest, industrious people upon the farm and in the shop and following other lines of labor; but day by day I learn that no laws upon that line are to be passed. There is to be no modification of the exacting tariff laws that stand like a stone wall around the trusts.

The war-revenue tax is to remain to burden and harass the people. The farmer and laborer are to be forgotten in the mad rush toward commercial and military imperialism. The trusts and combines, with a king—the bank trust—to command their cohorts, are to be unbridled and turned loose upon the people, while the people themselves have no day in the legislative halls of this country.

Mr. Chairman, I entertain no hostility to legitimate capital. I would encourage its use and investment in developing not only the great resources of my own State, but of all the country. It is the friend of labor and of the people, and I would not only encourage it, but protect it. But it is the enormous aggregations of capital that seek not to build up, but to tear down—that seek by means of its great power to oppress the people—that I would crush. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I would put iron bits in the mouth of relentless greed. I would chain the green-eyed monster, Avarice, and free the people from their oppression and wrong.

I would encourage and favor legitimate capital and its investment in the industries and business of the country in such a way as to be profitable to its owner and at the same time bless mankind.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that my sympathies and my heart are with the man who by honest effort and honest labor, in an open and fair contest, wins his way in life. My father was one of the common people. By his strong arm and honest heart he helped to build up my native State. I grew to manhood under his care and tutelage; I stood by him when he was called to his reward, and after he was gone, inspired by his life and sacred memory, and in honor of his independent and stalwart manhood, I resolved that I, myself, would be one of the common people, that their cause should be my cause, that all who sought to oppress them should be my enemies; not that I hated them, but because of their injustice; and by this resolution I have lived. And faithful to its obligations I shall continue to be as long as the struggle for right, justice, and liberty shall last and I shall live.

I will plant my feet in the footprints of the fathers, where there is no danger of stumbling or going astray. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I shall not consume any of the short time allotted me in the discussion of the economic principles underlying this bill and its probable operation. On a former occasion I discussed those principles with more or less thoroughness upon this floor, and so, assuming them as premises generally agreed upon, I shall proceed at once to the consideration of the provisions of the particular bill under discussion. But it is futile to try to consider this bill, even, with any degree of completeness, within the time set apart for its discussion. If every minute should be utilized as contemplated in the rule enforced here by the majority, there would be less than five minutes available for each member of the House as his proportionate share.

It will be impossible to do more in so limited a time than to attack a salient here and there, and then transfer the whole debate to that broader forum where the previous question does not operate and where no committee on rules is tolerated.

I am persuaded, Mr. Chairman, that this is the first time in the history of legislative procedure that a far-reaching financial measure, involving radical changes in the financial system of a people, has been thrust so suddenly upon a legislative body and forced to a passage within the brief space of one week.

And why this haste? Is there some great crisis impending in the financial world? Are our trade relations depressed because the gold standard has never been written in the statute books? Are our securities depreciating in the markets of the world because the word "gold" has not been written in the bond? Assuredly not. Neither the one nor any of these conditions prevail; there is absolutely nothing impending that is considered competent to justify legislative interference with the financial system of a country. On the contrary, there never was a moment in the history of our country, or in the history of any other country, when general monetary conditions and business relations were more satisfactory—if one accept as true one-half the boasts of enthusiastic gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber.

It is true that conditions are largely improved, and I congratulate the country that this is true. But it is equally true, Mr. Chairman, that the prosperity we enjoy is to a considerable extent fortuitous in origin and factitious in character. Misfortune and disaster in other parts of the world have opened those markets to the overflowing granaries of the West at good prices. The military operations of the United States for eighteen months past against Spain and the Philippines, together with the war in South Africa, have combined to create an enormous demand for material of all sorts that has kept our farms and factories alike busy at remunerative prices. Coincident with all this there comes a shortage in the cotton production unprecedented in the history of its culture; and while the bulk of the crop, as usual, had passed out of the hands of the farmers before the full scope of the shortage had been realized, still they have gotten a larger share of the advance than in former years.

So that, Mr. Chairman, there is a degree of general prosperity that is very gratifying to every American; but, as stated, it is of a fortuitous nature, and its origin lies wholly outside the agencies of the Republican party.

There is no pretense by the apologists for this measure that any immediate need of change exists. Why, then, is this bill here under such unusual circumstances?

Is the Republican party driven to it by its platform pledges?

Is it impelled by stress of its campaign pledges to bring this bill here at this time and in this way? Nay, verily. The platform pledges of that great organization in 1896 stood stoutly for bimetalism by international agreement; and the spokesmen for the party have again and again repudiated the insinuation that the party ever stood for the single gold standard.

Not only so, six and a half million American freemen went to the ballot box in 1896 and voted for Bryan and bimetalism without the agreement or consent of anybody; so that ninety-nine hundredths of American voters, in their latest expression upon the question, registered their voices for bimetalism of one sort or the other.

Whence, then, I repeat, comes the demand for this bill? According to the claims of the advocates of the measure there never was a time when the people at large were thinking or demanding less in respect to financial legislation. They are too busy reaping the results of prevailing prosperity, we are told, and that there is a certain factitious prosperity of the spotted variety, due to fortuitous circumstances utterly independent of parties or platforms, no one will deny. Who, then, is demanding this legislation?

Why demand it so insistently and force it with such precipitancy just at this time, when admittedly the attention of the people is momentarily diverted in other channels? Is there a method in this madness? The approaches of the gold standard proper to the goal of their desire have rarely ever been won by direct assault.

Their first great vantage was won in 1873 by methods that merit a harsher term than indirection. Under the guise of a codification of the coinage laws that year they dropped out the silver dollar, which had up to that time been specifically designated as the standard of value.

Their next great vantage was in the early days of the Fifty-fourth Congress, while the attention of the people was centered upon the tariff issue. We may not be able to locate, Mr. Chairman, the demand for such a measure as this, but we can all see at a glance to whose benefit it inures. The merest tyro in finance need not read far into its provisions to see in whose interest it is drawn.

Without entering upon a detailed analysis of its provisions—

there is no time for that—I proceed to state briefly my objections to the measure; and a casual glance will fully justify my contention, I think.

1. In the first place, I oppose it because it proposes to change the money of payment of our bonds without the consent of the people, who are a party to the contract. As they now read, the bonds of this Government are payable, both principal and interest, in coin, and coin under the terms of the Constitution includes both silver and gold. Here, then, is a proposition to strike out the money of payment, agreed upon beforehand by both parties, and substitute therefor a scarcer and supposedly more valuable money.

And the proposition is to do this unjust thing without any demand from the people—nay, more; it is proposed to do it without consulting the people or so much as saying “by your leave.” Was there ever a more high-handed, a more impudent, assumption on the part of any political party intrusted for the time being with representative powers? Was there ever a more servile surrender of a people's rights at the hands of those who had sought and secured the confidence of that people upon pledges of a different tenor?

Think of it. The party whose proud boast in the past has been that it stood invariably for “great moral ideas;” that party deliberately changing the contract of the people who trusted them, to the enormous disadvantage of their confiding constituency! Changing the contract to the disadvantage of the people without the consent of the people, did I say? It is worse than that, Mr. Chairman. They are here proposing to change it in this bill in the face of distinct instructions to the contrary. Time and again have the representatives of the bond syndicates met the representatives of the American people and sought by open and by insidious means to get this precise thing done, and each time they have met decided and deserved rebuff.

Not even in the hour of national danger, not in the hour of national disaster, not in the throes of threatened national chaos did these shysters relent or cease to press their demands. But not even in those dire extremities could a Congress be found so servile or so craven as to surrender the people's rights. Why, Mr. Chairman, the American people only a few years ago paid, or agreed to pay, in the aggregate, $16,000,000 for the poor privilege of retaining the word coin in sixty-two and a half million bonds.

It was a distinct proposition, arising from the bond syndicate then enjoying the exclusive privilege of handling American securities. The representatives of the American people refused the proposition in the most emphatic terms, preferring to pay the difference in dollars rather than betray the trust of a confiding people and lay an ever-increasing burden upon future generations without the consent of the people themselves.

If the difference charged by the bond syndicate for the privilege of writing “coin” instead of “gold” in the bonds represents the real difference in their value, it is fair to assume that the same difference was exacted with reference to the other outstanding coin bonds of the Government; and upon the same basis that difference would be in the neighborhood of $340,000,000.

If this bill becomes law it will be tantamount to giving this enormous difference to the bondholders as a bonus and at the same time give them all they demanded in the first instance—they will get the difference and the thing for which the difference was paid.

It means more than this, however. It means fastening upon the present generation and upon posterity an additional burden that will grow with a steadily accelerating velocity as the days go by, and as the production of gold fails to keep pace with steadily increasing demands laid upon it—a burden, Mr. Chairman, that must be paid ultimately by productive industry in farm and forge and factory. Mr. Chairman it is inconceivable that a great party which has been trusted by the people of this country could be found willing to impose that burden under any circumstances, least of all to impose it without the consent expressly granted of the people.

2. In the second place, I oppose this bill because it is essentially a measure of contraction. Its ultimate and inevitable effect will be to contract the volume of currency by just so much as the amount of the greenbacks outstanding. That is to say, that there will be a speedy and inevitable subtraction of $346,000,000 from the volume of currency now outstanding.

It is bound to be so. There is no escape. Under the terms of the bill gold dollars must be paid out whenever these greenbacks are presented at the Treasury. And under the terms of the bill, also, these greenbacks must stay in the Treasury until an equal number of gold dollars are locked up in their place. Under existing conditions both gold and greenbacks are in circulation simultaneously. Under the terms of this bill when the gold is out the greenbacks must be in; when the greenbacks are out the gold must be in. And yet gentlemen on the other side deny that this means contraction; and, be it observed, contraction means distress, low prices for farm products—it means stagnation of business, paralysis of trade. Not only so, but if, as may easily happen, the gold so paid out for greenbacks is shipped abroad, there will be a contraction of the volume of the circulation equal to double the greenbacks so redeemed. Conditions favorable to the export of gold may occur at any time; they are most liable to occur when the demands for money in this country are most urgent. But this is not all. Under subsequent sections of the bill it is easy to see that those conditions may be produced artificially at any time by cooperation of the banks of this country and through them the banks of the world.

Mr. Chairman, there has never been a time in the history of the world when, in my judgment, there was too much money in circulation. On the other hand, the field of history is strewn from end to end with wreck and ruin and starvation and desperation by the inordinate stringency of money. Hence, I am disposed to resist with all the energy and ability I possess any measure that even makes possible a contraction of our circulating medium.

This much of contraction is, in my judgment, as certain and fixed as the all-pervading law of cause and effect—contraction to the amount of the greenbacks outstanding, at the least. There is good reason to believe, however, that the silver currency and silver certificates might be used to the same purpose should the shifting values of international exchange make it worth while for the speculative cliques of the country to collect the subsidiary coin and silver certificates and take them to the Treasury for redemption.

But pass this; there remains the unquestioned and necessary contraction by the amount of the greenbacks; and this in its ultimate result means $346,000,000 less money, at the very least estimate, available for purposes of trade and for the handling of the great staple crops of our country.

3. And not only so, but under the terms of the bill a further contraction is made possible by the surrender of bonds held for circulation of national banks. These banks may, by concert of action, in a day withdraw these bonds down to the minimum limit, lock up these notes, and thus contract the volume of currency to an alarming degree. Suppose such contraction should take place at the time when the cotton crop was to be marketed, or the wheat crop. Does anyone doubt what the effect would be upon the price of those commodities? And this dangerous power is intrusted, under this bill, in the hands of the banks, the very class of people whose interest is supposed to lie in the direction of tight money, which means dear money; which in turn means cheap labor, cheap products of labor.

4. Only one other feature of this extraordinary bill will I call attention to at this time. That is the extraordinary power vested by its terms in the Secretary of the Treasury. Do gentlemen on the other side realize what the issue of bonds means? It means a mortgage upon posterity; a mortgage means interest to pay; interest to pay means taxes to pay. And so it comes to pass that under this bill the power to tax is vested, in the last analysis, in one man—a power hitherto religiously guarded and reserved by an unbroken line of precedents and traditions in the people themselves alone. Mr. Chairman, we can not afford, in my judgment, to surrender that power into the keeping of any man, be he never so wise and honest and true to the traditions of our past.

Too much patriotic blood has been poured out in wrestling that power of taxation from the hand of despotism and safeguarding it as the exclusive and inalienable prerogative of the people.

Mr. Chairman, there is one redeeming feature about these proceedings—only one. When the roll shall be called next Monday it will be essentially a vote of lack of confidence in the reelection of William McKinley. It can have no other significance in the light of the declarations of the Republican leaders on this floor. They claim that the country is on the gold basis to-day and has been for the past three years, by the grace of God and of William McKinley.

If this be true, is it not equally true that the gold standard is safe so long as William McKinley remains in the Presidential chair? If you are confident in the reelection of Mr. McKinley, why safeguard the gold standard by legislation on the eve of the election? This extraordinary precaution on your part can have but one meaning, and that is a lack of confidence in the result of the election next year. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

[Mr. TALBERT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. FARIS) having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill No. 1, and had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET (at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 15, 1899.

Prayer by Rev. LUCIEN CLARK, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings; when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate authorizing the Secretary of War to print, in excess of 1,000 copies authorized by the act of January 12, 1895, 5,000 copies of the annual report of Maj. Gen. E. S. Otis, United States Volunteers, commanding the Department of the Pacific and Eighth Army Corps and military governor in the Philippines, dated August 31, 1899.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4152) to extend the time for examination of monthly accounts by bureaus and offices of the War Department; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1899, on the 19th day of said month; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. There evidently would be no quorum of the Senate present to-morrow, and I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RETURN OF CANNON, BANNERS, ETC., TO MEXICO.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of the legislature of Colorado, praying for the return to the Republic of Mexico of cannon, banners, and other trophies captured by the United States forces during the war between the United States and Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint memorial No. 1.—By Senator Basela.

The general assembly of the State of Colorado to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled; to the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the general assembly of the State of Colorado, respectfully represent that, by reason of their geographical proximity, their topographical similarity, and their historical origin in common with the Republic of Mexico, the attention of your memorialists has been especially called to the extent and character of our sister Republic and the relation of the United States toward her people and their sentiments.

That interesting people occupy a region having a common border line with the United States extending over 2,000 miles, a region replete with history that seems to fill all the epochs since the cradle ages, with a marked and wonderful variety of vegetable products, the most extensive mineral output, and a vast commerce in domestic animals. These, with a government quite similar to our own, with a development on lines of higher civilization parallel with our own, can not but excite in our breasts a lively, honorable, and sympathetic interest.

Late statistics show that the Republic of Mexico received during her last fiscal year imports to the value of $42,304,095, of which more than one-half, or $23,861,001, came from the United States. They exported during the same year a total value of $111,346,494, of which $80,742,951 came to the United States, most of which, outside the precious metals, being of a character not infringing on our manufactured productions.

Citizens of the United States have investments in Mexico divided among railroads, smelting, herding, rubber and coffee plantations, and other fixed values, a sum approximating $300,000,000.

For more than three hundred years Mexico was under the dominion of Spain. In 1821, following the line of most colonies on this hemisphere, she declared her independence and shed her blood that liberty might approach the minimum degrees of latitude and settle its benign influences over her vast dominion. Under liberty and free government since Juarez, Mexico has not attempted the portals of the future with the blood-rusted key of the past, but with her educational, religious, and internal improvement systems abreast with the present, she is unlocking her future, under the administration of President Diaz, by engendering a policy in harmony with the most advanced lines of civilization. No doubt that the example set by our forefathers in resisting the tyranny of Great Britain was the spark that inspired the Mexican patriots to throw off the yoke of Spain, and, later, that spark still burning on her altars, caused her to resist the attempt to erect an alien and hostile dynasty within her borders. And who will deny that the sentiment of patriotism was the potency of her arms in resisting the aggression of the United States in our war with that sister Republic?

Time has smoothed the ruffles of that strife, and forgetfulness has settled forever its amenities. But time never grows old to the patriotic sentiments of a people.

In our war with our sister Republic we captured many cannon, guns, banners, and other trophies of war, many of which were captured from Spain by Mexico during her struggle for independence. They are to Mexico mementoes of the blood purchase of her liberty. To us they are mere superannuated guns and moldering banners, in no wise needed to preserve in the hearts of our people the memory of the valor of her soldiery. Some of these mementoes are at West Point and other places, particularly the Vera Cruz, the Conteras, the Chapultepec, the Molino del Rey, and the City of Mexico. Some of these again spoke for liberty, as in the case at Greensburg, Ky., during the war for the preservation of the Union.

The late achievements of our country, our efforts in the cause of humanity, the prowess of our arms, the brilliant victories of our Navy, have lifted us to a conspicuous position, where we command at once the wonder and admiration of the world. We can afford to be magnanimous. Your memorialists believe that the return of these cannon, guns, banners, and other trophies to our sister Republic would show that generous spirit of high-planned fraternity that would excite in the people of that Republic a confidence in our friendly and peaceful intentions, kindle a lively interest in our welfare, and invoke a love for us as a people that would find root in the most arid acre of her possessions.

Your memorialists, in view of these considerations and in harmony with the sentiments they enjoin, pray your honorable bodies to provide by law, or joint resolution, that the cannon, banners, and other trophies which were captured by the United States in the conflict between this Republic and the Republic of Mexico be returned to the Mexican administration with such expression as a half-century of peace may suggest.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

That this memorial be enrolled and one copy be sent to the President of the United States, and one copy to each of our members in the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled.

FRANCIS CARNEY,

President of the Senate.

WILLIAM G. SMITH,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CHARLES S. THOMAS,

Governor of the State of Colorado.

HISTORY OF THE CAPITOL BUILDING.

Mr. McMILLAN. I submit a paper giving a history of the construction of the Capitol building, which is of much value at this time, when the people of the District are about to celebrate the centennial of the removal of the seat of Government to the District of Columbia. I move that the paper be printed as a document and that 200 copies, bound in cloth, be printed for the use of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Michigan any idea as to what expense will be involved? Is it required that the motion shall go to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. HALE. It must be referred if the cost of printing exceeds $500.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; it does not have to go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without any objection, the order will be made to print the paper as a document, as requested.

LIST OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. WARREN. Yesterday I made a report on behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] from the Committee on Claims. I ask that an order be made to refer the report to the Committee on Printing. The report was merely accepted yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MOBILE MARINE DOCK COMPANY.

Mr. PETTUS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the claim of the Mobile Marine Dock Company against the United States for compensation for property taken or damaged and for use of property during the war of the rebellion, referred to in Senate bill No. 285, be, and is hereby, under the provisions of section 14 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," referred to the Court of Claims for ascertainment and report to the Senate of the facts on the following points, with any other facts pertinent and material to said claim:

1. Nature and extent of control exercised and use made of property of the Mobile Marine Dock Company, at Mobile, Ala., by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army during the war of the rebellion and the period during which the same was done or had.
 2. At the rates in effect at the dock of the Mobile Marine Dock Company at the time when control of the same was first taken by said Quartermaster's Department, charged by said company for like services to vessels of private owners, the amount of compensation due for (1) docking at said dock, done during the period of the control of the same by said Quartermaster's Department and under orders of the same, of vessels, including vessels belonging to the Navy of the United States, vessels permanently or temporarily in the military service of the United States, and any and all other vessels; (2) use of said dock had for and in the repairing of such vessels during such period by or under orders of such department, and (3) use had by or under orders of said department during said period, in and about the repairing of vessels not docked at said dock, of machinery, tools, and other appliances appertaining to said dock.

3. The value at that time of all lumber and other materials and supplies furnished by the Mobile Marine Dock Company during said period to said Quartermaster's Department for use in and about repairs to vessels; the amount of compensation due at rates then current at Mobile, Ala., for dressing and other preparation of lumber or other materials done at the sawmill and shops and yard of the Mobile Marine Dock Company for or under orders of said Quartermaster's Department not embraced in the estimated value of lumber and other materials and supplies furnished; and the amount of the value of tools and other appliances of the Mobile Marine Dock Company taken during said period by or under orders of said Quartermaster's Department and applied to uses of the United States Army and never returned to the Mobile Marine Dock Company.

4. The value of the use during said period had by said Quartermaster's Department of the work shed, smithy, warehouse, and office and ship yard of the Mobile Marine Dock Company, as distinct from the compensation due for the dockage and use of dock and appliances referred to in the second item above.

5. Cost, including value of materials, of repairs made by the Mobile Marine Dock Company, upon the abandonment of control of its said property by said Quartermaster's Department, of injuries done to said dock by the use of the same made under orders of said Quartermaster's Department during said period.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth rules may be suspended, and that the order I send to the desk in regard to the standing and select committees of the Senate may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that Rules XXIV and XXV may be suspended and that the order introduced by him may receive present consideration. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read the order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to state that there are a number of vacancies left in the minority representation on these committees, some of which will be filled by a new Senator, who is expected to take his seat at no distant day, and others will be filled by those who are already here, the assignments for which the committee did not have the time to make.

Mr. ALDRICH submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committees on Inter-oceanic Canals, Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and the Relations with Cuba be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ clerks to be paid at the rate of $2,250 each per annum; that the Committee on Coast and Insular Survey be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk to be paid at the rate of $1,800 per annum; the above clerks to be paid from miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate until provided for by law.

Resolved, That the Committee on Industrial Expositions be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk at the rate of $1,800 per annum.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas subsequently reported, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, the foregoing resolutions without amendment; and they were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN SAMOA.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested, if not inconsistent with the public interests, to send to the Senate the report made by Hon. Bartlett Tripp, the member of the Samoan Commission on behalf of the United States of America.

GREAT PEDEE RIVER IMPROVEMENT IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit a report of survey and estimate for the improvement of the Great Pedee River, South Carolina, between Cheraw and the Wilmington, Columbia and Augusta Railroad bridge.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4153) to extend the time for examination of monthly accounts by bureaus and offices of the War Department was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1899, on the 19th day of said month was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the usual joint resolution which is passed before the holidays. I do not see any necessity to have it referred.

Mr. HALE. No; let it be passed.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be placed on its passage.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read the second time at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 18, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 15, 1899.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the order, the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 1, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, will please take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 1, the financial bill, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] is recognized.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the banking and bondholding interests of this country, those mighty and potential influences which have for so many years dominated the Congress of the United States and dictated the financial policy of this Government, have decreed that the bill now under consideration shall pass this House without amendment and without change. This bill, Mr. Chairman, is not dissimilar in its main and essential features to that which was reported to this House in the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Committee on Banking and Currency. That bill, like this, was intended to provide by statutory enactment for a single gold standard of value; to make every interest-bearing obligation payable in gold; to retire from circulation and impound in the Treasury every dollar of the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and to confer upon the national banks enormous privileges and powers hitherto not enjoyed by them; in effect, to give to the national banks absolute and supreme control of the paper currency of the United States.

In other words, if this bill becomes a law, it will establish by legal enactment the single gold standard, make the gold dollar the unit of value, retire from the channels of trade and commerce $346,000,000 of United States notes, which President Garfield declared, in his letter accepting the Republican Presidential nomination, to be as "national as the flag" and "equal to coin," and which from that day to this have been universally regarded as the best paper money the world has ever seen. It carries out the Republican policy of taking the Government out of the banking business and puts the national banks into the Government business with a vengeance. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

It may be worth while to recall some of the legislation of the Republican party leading up to this measure, by which it is intended that the financial and industrial servitude of the people of this great Republic shall be made complete. It is not an attractive story nor is it one to which the American people can point with any degree of pride.

It is a story of scheming, of treachery, of insatiate greed, and even of crime. The public debt which grew out of the war between the States had reached the gigantic sum of $2,844,649,000 in the summer of 1865, and of this debt $2,381,530,000 bore interest. The principal of the original bonds was payable in lawful money, which was understood to be United States notes, and that of the refunding bonds in coin. The interest was payable in coin. Up to the present moment no bonds or other Government obligations have ever specifically been made payable in gold, although in recent years they have been treated by our Treasury officials as if they were so payable. Upon this enormous indebtedness the American people have paid in the past third of a century nearly, if not quite, three thousand million. This bare statement will of itself convey some idea of the gigantic power which has resided and still resides in the hands of the bondholding plutocracy of this country. Although nominally the principal of our public debt has been greatly reduced in these years, yet, if measured in the wheat of the farmer, it is as large as it was thirty-four years ago.

Observe, Mr. Chairman, that these bonds, payable in lawful money, were purchased with greenbacks, then greatly depreciated in value. In March, 1869, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit." That act provided that bonds payable in lawful money should be made payable in coin. This was the first step in carrying out the scheme which we see to-day about to eventuate in the payment in gold of every interest-bearing obligation of the Government. The next step was the passage of the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt." By virtue of this act the public debt of the Government was refunded into bonds payable specifically, principal and interest, in coin. It is true that the interest rate was lowered, but the life of the bonds was materially lengthened, and, being payable in coin instead of greenbacks, the holders thereof, who had procured the passage of the act, were most eager to avail themselves of its provisions. By this refunding process the value of their holdings was greatly enhanced. The bonds were made payable in gold or silver, and gold and silver were then at a considerable premium.

I scarcely need mention the next act in this bondholder's conspiracy. It was to secure, at the hands of a complaisant Republican Congress, the passage of an act which has been denounced the world over as a diabolical crime against the American people. By the act of February 13, 1873, the Republican party struck down and demonetized the silver dollar, which for a period of eighty-one years had been the legal unit of money. I shall not dwell upon this hideous page of Republican financial legislation. No words of mine could fitly portray the enormity of this act of political and financial perfidy. Of all the sins committed against the people of this Republic at the instance of the bondholding power, this is by common consent the most heinous. It was soon to be followed by another act of far-reaching importance. Having made the public indebtedness payable in either gold or silver, and having stricken down and demonetized silver, it only remained to provide for the resumption of specie payments. This was done by an act passed January 14, 1875, which provided that specie payments should be resumed on January 1, 1879.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not stop to point out just how the resumption of specie payments was accomplished. Had not the act of 1878, passed over the veto of President Hayes and known as the Bland-Allison law, been enacted, it is safe to affirm that the task imposed by the act of 1875 would have been far more difficult, if not impossible, of accomplishment. Under the Bland-Allison Act there was added to the volume of our currency more than 400,000,000 silver dollars, for which the people of this country are indebted to the Democratic party.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I have the right to conclude that the bill which we are now considering is but the culmination of a carefully considered and well-planned scheme, contrived thirty long years ago, for the purpose of enhancing the value of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the Government and thus adding to the already enormous wealth of the individuals and corporations into whose hands the great bulk of it has long since been collected.

I fully realize, Mr. Chairman, that the Democrats of this House are powerless to prevent the consummation of this great crime proposed to be committed against the American people. We can only hope that this bill may find its grave in the Senate.

For the first time in the history of the Republican party it has thrown off all disguise and come out squarely and avowedly for the single gold standard.

The platform upon which President Harrison was nominated and elected in 1888 declared in these words:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

The Republican platform of 1892 employs this scarcely less emphatic indorsement of bimetalism:

The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as money.

When the Republican party again assembles in national convention, it will be entirely fitting for it to amend its platform of 1892 so as to make it read as follows:

The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetalism, but the bondholding power demands the use of both gold and national bank notes as money.

The attitude which the Republican party has now openly assumed toward silver furnishes ample proof, if other proof were necessary, that its past professions of friendship for that metal were both insincere and false and were only made for the purpose of catching votes. In the future, it is to be presumed, you will place your reliance solely upon the money power, by and through which it is your hope and your purpose to influence the individual voter. Do not be too sanguine. Unless I am mistaken, the popular upheaval will be greater than you now imagine if you pass this measure of perfidy and financial iniquity. The American people have not yet reached that stage of moral decadence and political servitude which alone can justify your faith in a gospel according to Shylock.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], whom I do not now see in his seat, has asked if any Representative upon this floor would say there had been no increase of prosperity in his district. It may be true, Mr. Chairman, that in the district which the gentleman so ably represents there has been an increase of prosperity. I have no knowledge of the industrial and financial conditions existing in any district in Iowa. I do know, however, that in many sections of our country there has been marked improvement in trade and business. But wherever such has been the case there are reasons not far to seek which will account for that improvement, and they are in no wise the result of any economic or financial legislation for which the Republican party is responsible. On the contrary, it is due entirely to other causes and has come in spite of bad Republican legislation. Moreover, this improvement in business is confined to spots and is, in most instances, lacking in every element of permanency.

For nearly two years the Government has been expending enormous sums in the fortification of our seaports and in the maintenance of our armies and navies. The prosecution of our war with Spain and the Filipinos has turned into the channels of trade and commerce millions upon millions of money. The ordinary revenues of our Government have been immensely augmented by those derived under the war-revenue law, and we are informed that the President has exercised the authority conferred upon him to borrow money on the credit of the United States and under that authority has actually borrowed $198,678,720.

The expenditure of these vast sums has unquestionably stimulated and improved business in certain sections. The increase thus produced in the volume of our circulating medium has enhanced prices and given an impetus to trade. There has, for instance, been wonderful improvement in the iron and steel industries.

To maintain an army of 50,000 men on the other side of the globe alone necessitates colossal expenditures in the way of supplies and transportation. The great transcontinental railway systems are all doubtless increasing their gains. But, after all this has been said, the fact remains, and time will demonstrate, that much of this vaunted prosperity is purely speculative and illusory.

In the strictly agricultural sections of our country there has been, I venture to affirm, no improvement in either financial or industrial conditions. Certainly there has been no appreciable improvement in the trade and business conditions of the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor. On the contrary, while the prices of almost everything we buy have been advanced, our wheat, and corn, and oats, and our fish and oysters bring less to-day than they brought a year ago. There has been, it is true, some advance in the price of cotton, but that our Southern friends attribute to a decreased production. You Republicans laugh at this. But when we tell you that wheat is selling for 70 cents to-day, while it brought over a dollar a year ago, you reply at once, "Overproduction." You can not say that there has been any increase or overproduction in the supply of oysters. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, the lack of prosperity in many of the agricultural communities is due to and is directly traceable to the legislation of the Republican party. In many sections of my State there have sprung into existence within the past few years quite a number of fruit and vegetable canneries. This once promising industry has been almost destroyed as the result of Republican legislation.

THE TRUSTS.

Before the enactment of the McKinley tariff act the duty on imported tin plates was 1 cent a pound. That act more than doubled the duty. It was reduced under the Wilson bill to 1½ cents per pound, but the rate as fixed in the Dingley or present law is 14 cents. The Republican party has boasted that its tariff legislation was the mother of the tin-plate industry. How, then, can it escape responsibility for the tin-plate trust? At the beginning of the canning season of 1898 3-pound tin cans could be purchased at $1.45 per hundred. The season of 1899 saw them advanced to $2.90 per hundred, despite the fact that canned goods were cheaper than they were the year previous. As a result, most of the canneries were shut down and hundreds and thousands of men and women thrown out of employment. The vegetables, chiefly tomatoes, perished in the fields of the farmers, and many of those who had purchased fertilizers upon the faith of their crops were forced to sacrifice their cattle and horses in order to pay the debts thus incurred. Those canners who were able to purchase cans, and who kept their contract with the farmers, did so at a dead loss.

In my own immediate community I know personally of many cases of actual distress, caused by the arbitrary and unwarranted advance in the price of tin plate by the American Tin Plate Company. This company was organized under the laws of New Jersey just one year ago. To-day, as I learn, it embraces some 40 plants and 280 mills—practically every mill in the United States which manufactures tin plate for the general trade. It is capitalized at $50,000,000. In order to restrict production and enhance its profits, this gigantic so-called "industrial" combination had closed up during the first ten months of its operations 9 plants and 40 mills, 2 of which plants and 4 of which mills were located in Baltimore, Md. These Baltimore City mills were not only shut down and their employees turned out of doors, but they have been actually dismantled. Within a few months after the formation of this colossal trust the price of tin plate advanced 100 per cent. I hold in my hand a press dispatch from Indianapolis, Ind., dated two days ago, in which it is stated that tin plate worth $2.25 per box two years ago is now selling at $9.30 per box, and that another advance of 10 per cent will be made within the next two weeks.

Mr. Chairman, the American tin-plate trust is the child of the Republican party. It could not exist for a single hour but for the protection given to it by the Dingley tariff law. Trusts, we are told, tend to lessen the cost of production. That may be, and doubtless is, true; but that they crush out and destroy honest competition and enormously increase the prices paid by the consumer must be manifest to everybody.

Unless some means can be devised by which this trust evil can be extirpated, or at least abated, general prosperity is impossible in this country. We are told in the public press that we may soon expect an upheaval among the manufacturers of tin plate; that the American Tin Plate Company is soon to be overthrown.

Heaven grant that this may be true! For myself, I do not believe it. The American Tin Plate Company not only has a practical monopoly of the production of tin plate, but it also controls the raw materials out of which tin plate is manufactured. This it does through the National Steel Company, an associated trust which monopolizes the production of tin-plate bars. More than this, Mr. Chairman, it is reputed to have a contract covering a term of years with the half dozen or more manufacturers of tin-plate machinery, thus preventing outsiders from equipping competing plants. Is it surprising then that under such conditions as I have described the farmers of my district should be somewhat skeptical when told in the gold-standard Republican press that they are enjoying a great flood of prosperity?

There are, perhaps, more ways than one to account for that prosperity which the gentleman from Iowa would have us to understand exists in his district. One of them has occurred to me. His constituents are more fortunate than mine in that there is paid annually into his district a vast sum for pensions. During the last fiscal year there was paid into the State of Iowa the sum of $5,156,942. There are eleven Congressional districts in that State, and if we assume that an equal amount was distributed in each the gentleman's district received last year, in the way of pensions, $468,813. There are seven counties in his district, and a similar assumption would give to each of them $66,973. Such a sum distributed annually throughout the district which I have the honor to represent would at least serve to alleviate the distress which the tin-plate and other trusts, protected and fostered by Republican legislation, have inflicted upon that people.

But, Mr. Chairman, if one trust can compass so much evil, what may not the hundreds of mammoth combinations now operating in the United States be capable of working? There are the sugar trust, the tobacco trust, the rubber trust, the oil trust, the window-glass trust, the leather trust, the paper trust, the linseed and cotton-seed oil trust, the American malting trust, the American steel and wire trust, and hundreds upon hundreds of kindred concerns, all representing vast aggregations of capital, and all organized for the purpose of controlling the production and distribution of the common necessities of life and of plundering the people. I charge that the Republican party is responsible for this deplorable condition of affairs. These trusts and combinations are all dependent, to a more or less extent, for their very existence upon the Republican protective tariff.

But, Mr. Chairman, the most gigantic as well as the most dangerous, the most all-pervading as well as the most cruel, the most tyrannical as well as the most deadly of all trusts is the hideous money trust. It is that parent trust which controls the Republican party, which, as I have shown, has dictated its financial policy for so many years, and which has driven it, in the face of its many platform declarations to the contrary, and in spite of the professions and protestations of its greatest leaders, living and dead, to come out at last squarely and unequivocally in favor of a single gold standard.

Verily, it would seem that unless these monster trusts shall work their own destruction, the evils which flow from them must be endured by the American people so long as their destinies are controlled by the Republican party. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the presentation and settlement of the pending measure does not demand or call for acrimonious discussion. The country does not believe and will not believe that the Republicans are wholly bad, or that the Democrats, Populists, or Free Silver Republicans are wholly ignorant. The bill is not properly described by its title. Its purposes are wider, farther reaching than indicated.

The bill seeks to and will, if enacted into law, fix gold as the only standard of value of all property by making all other coin and forms of currency directly redeemable in gold—this to include the now standard silver dollar. It is an unconditional surrender to the national banks of the sovereign function of government "to coin and issue money," with an enlargement of the rights and powers of these banks now enjoyed by law. It creates a monster trust that, in my judgment, will fully and remorselessly control the volume of our money, not in the interest of the business or labor of the country, but in the interest of the money mongers and selfish greed. It changes every existing contract for the payment of money.

Its discussion does not involve the issues raised by the 1896 Chicago platform or the St. Louis Republican platform of that year, except so far as its provisions antagonize the one and violate the pledges of the other. I shall not now, Mr. Chairman, discuss the reasons or beliefs that brought the 1896 platform into existence, but will merely content myself for the present by declaring that my political hopes and fortunes are tied hard and fast to the Chicago platform and William Jennings Bryan.

It was agreed by both parties in 1896 that the "single gold standard" was not desirable for and not beneficial to the people of the United States. The Republican party and platform of that year declared it hurtful and vicious, but not so bad as to warrant us in discarding it alone, and pledged the party to use all effort to secure international agreement for its overthrow, while the Democratic party believed and declared it so utterly vicious and hurtful as to justify us in independent action. The country—at least the Democratic portion—did not believe the platform utterances of the Republican party—its leaders—were sincere or made in good faith. The promise there made was accepted by the rank and file of the Republican party. These men, as some critical and perhaps observant folks have declared, aided by an exceedingly liberal distribution of "all forms of currency," succeeded in securing a prima facie majority in favor of the Republican ticket in November, 1896.

Was the promise to do your level best to bring about and secure "international agreement" made in good faith? What intelligent effort has the Republican party made to keep this pledge made the people? A commission, it is true, was appointed and sent abroad to confer with the principal countries of Europe, pretendedly in the interest of bimetalism. But this country and the world soon saw the hypocrisy of the whole business. While this commission was junketing about the capitals of the Old World to ascertain the will and pleasure of the banking house of My Lord Rothschilds, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States had outlined a "currency plan" and sent it, with his report, to the Congress, declaring the object and purpose of this Government was to "permanently establish the single gold standard in the United States," and the President, Mr. McKinley, declared he fully agreed with and indorsed the plan of the Secretary. And now the Republican party, as if to furnish the incontestible proof of its entire good faith, comes with this bill, the most drastic, radical measure ever proposed, and supports it without the loss of a man in this House.

What interests demand the enactment of this law, Mr. Chairman? No body of men ever assembled outside the countingroom of some great banking house, except the Indianapolis junta, has ever declared for or demanded such a law, and this junta, as everyone knows, was composed of special attorneys, representatives of selfish greed, and a few ancient relics that somehow survive the mutations of time. The industrial classes do not ask it. No commercial interest demands it. Manufacture does not seek it. Agriculture has felt its baleful effects. None but the dealers in money have any interest in its passage. What reason can you give the country? What excuse do you offer? What necessity do you pretend exists for this law?

You answer, "A sound and stable currency demands it; that the ceaseless drain upon the Treasury for gold to redeem the greenbacks demands it; that the 'endless chain' must be broken." You propose to retire the greenbacks, Treasury notes, and, indeed, every form of paper currency, permanently, except the national bank note, by redeeming them in gold. But you do not stop here. You declare by this bill that the standard silver dollar shall be directly redeemable in gold, but, by a provision covertly intended to put the Treasury and its gold reserve at the mercy of the bond sharks, the silver dollar may be issued again when "deemed necessary," only that they may be returned again and gold demanded for them, and bonds issued to get the gold, thus welding the links of the "endless chain" you have heretofore declared must be broken.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House and the country to another feature of this bill and the attitude of the Republican party toward it. When the Democratic party and other bimetallic forces have demanded the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, the Republican party has appealed to the history of silver coinage in the United States and proudly boasted that in the life of the Government, prior to 1873, there had been less than 9,000,000 standard silver dollars coined, and that since that time, under Republican Administrations and limited silver coinage, more than 400,000,000 standard silver dollars have been coined and put in circulation, every dollar of which has been proclaimed to be the equal of a gold dollar anywhere in the world, because the policy and practice of the Republican party pledged the honor and faith of this Government to keep at par with the gold dollar the silver dollar, and this could only be done by limiting the coinage of the silver dollar. If this is the work of the Republican party, Mr. Chairman—and it has proudly and boastfully proclaimed it as such, always and everywhere declaring the Republican party a better friend to silver than the Democratic party—strange to say this party now comes and by this bill boldly and shamelessly proposes to bastardize its own children and discredit them before the world as base and spurious. By instinct, if by no other feeling or faculty, the beasts of the forest protect and fly to the rescue of their own, and it is left to the inhumanity of this party of "God and morality" and "national honor" to stigmatize and desert its own.

The crowning feature of the injustice and wrong this bill visits upon the country and its people, the taxpayers, is that section—No. 2—affecting present and future obligations and contracts for the payment of money, public and private. For the full understanding and effect of this section it must be read in connection with the first section of the bill, the two together being as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

Sec. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

This changes every obligation of the Government, every bond heretofore issued and sold, and every contract or obligation calling for the payment of money made in the course of the daily business transactions of the people. It is opposed to every notion or principle of justice, law, or equity. The attempt to carry into effect its principles or purposes in the affairs of daily life between man and man would not be tolerated by any court in the land. It violates every principle of common honesty and fair dealing. It retroacts and gives to the holder of money obligations the right to demand and exact of his debtor payment in a kind or form of money not specifically called for, and which perhaps he would not at the time the contract was made have obligated himself to pay in. It leaves the debtor no choice or alternative as to what kind of money he shall or may pay in, though by the very terms of his contract he had the choice and right to pay in any lawful money at the time he made his contract.

It declares that in the opinion of the Government of the United States, as delivered by the Republican party in Congress, but one party is necessary to the validity and binding effect of a contract. The rule of law throughout the civilized world and the commonly accepted belief of mankind everywhere that two or more parties were essential to the making of a valid and binding contract; that the parties must reach an agreement, and that this agreement must be the voluntary action of all parties to the contract; that no restraint, no duress, no fear or hope unduly excited must be practiced or exercised by the one over the other to give standing or character to a contract, is exploded by this bill. The law writers have never known the true principles governing contracts. The judges have never expounded a safe and sound principle to guide men in their business affairs. But one man is necessary to the establishment and validity of a contract to pay money, and that man is the creditor. So declares this bill.

Who demands this change, Mr. Chairman? Certainly not the man who must pay the money called for by the contract. Will anyone be so foolish as to believe that when a debtor has the option of paying in gold, silver, or legal-tender paper currency he will not only relinquish this option and right, but absolutely demand that the lawmakers shall compel him by statute to pay in one kind of money alone—gold—and that the scarcest and, by your admission, the best and highest-priced money? You admit that gold is the highest-priced dollar, because your chief excuse for fastening more certainly the gold standard upon the people by this bill is to put the United States upon a footing with the other great commercial countries of the world by making our obligations payable in the best dollar in the world. One dollar can not be better than any other dollar unless the one is higher than some other dollar, buys more labor or products of labor, more property, than some other dollar will buy.

This being true, if you change a contract for the payment of money by making the contract payable in a higher-priced dollar, a dollar that the debtor must give more of his labor or property to get, you do him a positive hurt, you materially injure him, and this should never be done, except upon compulsion of the clearest necessity for the public good or in obedience to the absolute right of the creditor to demand such payment. If this change has not the purpose or effect of enhancing the value of present money contracts, why make it? It could certainly be of no benefit in this case to a creditor, and he would not ask it, and surely the debtor would not want the change made; because if he did not have to pay in a higher-priced dollar than he first agreed to pay in, it might be more convenient for him to secure one of three or more forms of money on pay day than to be confined to the production and payment of one kind, gold, alone.

In the closing days of the Administration of the late G. Cleveland he wanted authority to issue bonds payable in gold alone. He urged that such an issue could be sold in the markets for more money and at a lower rate of interest than coin bonds and that a saving could be made the Government in the item of interest alone of about $16,000,000. The supposed patriotism and financial wisdom of the Republicans in Congress at that time refused to give the President this power, on the ground that gold was high priced and constantly rising in price and that the "United States and the Republican party, by interest and tradition," were in favor of bimetalism—the use of both gold and silver as basic money.

Every consideration of public policy, Mr. Chairman, every notion of common honesty, every rule of law or justice is against this measure. If a State in this Union should enact such a law, there is not a court in Christendom that would not declare it obnoxious to every sense of right and equity and contrary to the Constitution because it impaired the obligation of contracts. If a State legislature—aye, Mr. Chairman, if the Federal Congress—should declare by law that contracts heretofore made payable in gold coin alone should be payable, at the option of the payor, in gold, silver, or paper currency, the Supreme Court of the United States would denounce such a law as subversive of every known principle of right or justice, and you gentlemen on the Republican side of this House, in your own hearts and minds, must denounce this bill as the climax of injustice and wrong, but you feel impelled to submit to the sway of influences you can no more resist than the shallow-rooted tree can resist the fury of the storm. What the judgment of the courts may be on this bill I will not venture to assert. Strange and subtle influences overcome the courts at times, but in my humble opinion the judgment of the American people will condemn it and you as its authors at the ballot box when the full effect of it is felt throughout the country.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, under the limitations of this debate it is impossible to discuss the various provisions of this bill and their probable effect upon the people with that care and intelligence which its importance to the country demands. Containing, as it does, provisions which have never been discussed in Congress or before the people, and coming to this House from a Republican caucus without the consideration or report of any committee, the members on this side of the Chamber had a right to expect that the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. OVERSTREET] would in the beginning of this discussion give a fair and clear statement of its provisions.

But notwithstanding that gentleman who opened the debate and participated in the formation of this bill had unlimited time, by the courtesy of this House, he was satisfied to close his remarks with his carefully written defense in favor of the gold standard; and I insist that up to this hour here on the closing day of this debate some of the most important provisions of this bill have not even been referred to by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber. It seems to be part of the Republican policy in this discussion to make the people believe that beyond the first section of this bill, which is to establish the gold standard, it is a most innocent measure and of but little consequence to the country.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the assertions made on the other side that the time has come when the Government should be clear and explicit upon this subject, this bill does contain ambiguities and uncertainties in some of its provisions, but I want to assure the members of this House that those uncertainties will not be found in that part of the bill written for the benefit of the bondholders. The few lines in section 2 of this bill, which transfer from the pockets of the people to the vaults of the bondholders millions and millions of dollars without any consideration whatever, are as clear and explicit as the English language can make them.

Mr. Chairman, the first part of section 2 provides that all existing obligations of the Government, as well as those hereafter issued, shall be paid in gold coin. All these Government bonds were issued under laws which authorized them to be paid in coin—silver as well as gold. All the Government bonds referred to in this bill were issued, sold, and purchased with the distinct understanding that they were payable not in gold alone, but in coin, which meant silver as well as gold, and, as I now remember, it is so written in the face of the bond itself; and, I remember very distinctly that in the Fifty-third Congress, when the President of the United States, then engaged in negotiating a loan for the Government, sent his appeal to that Congress, urging its members to give the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue bonds payable in gold coin, claiming that such bonds could be sold for several million dollars more to the syndicate with which he was then about to deal than bonds issued under the law as it then existed, it was well known to the members of that Congress that the syndicate itself stated that they were willing to pay several million dollars more if Congress would authorize a gold bond. But that Congress refused to authorize the issue of gold bonds. I voted against the proposition myself. The statement of the gentleman from Ohio, given as a reason why he and others voted against issuing gold bonds, is no answer to the contention which I am about to make. It is well known that that syndicate purchased those bonds not as gold bonds, but as coin bonds, and bought them for several million dollars less because they were payable in coin—silver as well as gold.

So have the other obligations referred to been issued, sold, and purchased with the understanding that they were coin obligations, payable in silver as well as gold. This bill, Mr. Chairman, converts all these coin obligations into gold obligations, thereby adding millions and millions of dollars to the value of these bonds. And every million that you add to the value of these Government obligations is taken away from the pockets of the people, thereby requiring that much more of their property and their labor to discharge this indebtedness. An unsuspecting people before their own eyes to-day are being robbed of millions and millions of money by the acts of their representatives upon this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This alone, Mr. Chairman, ought to be sufficient, even in the eyes of the Republicans and certainly in the eyes of a Gold Democrat, who has always claimed to be fair between debtor and creditor, to defeat this bill. But, Mr. Chairman, that part of section 2 which follows is not so certain, and I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to that portion which I am about to read, and trust he may yet find time to give this House the benefit of his construction. I read from section 2, at the bottom of the page:

And all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

Which is the gold standard.

What do gentlemen mean by "in conformity with the standard established in said section" unless they mean that these private obligations are payable in gold coin, or in its equivalent, which is almost as burdensome, if not quite so? All these obligations—State, county, railroad-aid bonds, notes, and mortgages—to-day are payable in silver as well as gold. I do not overlook that which follows. There is a provision afterwards which seems to have been suggested by some Western Republican, whose eloquent words in behalf of free silver were still ringing in his ears, and they had to put in the following:

Nothing herein shall be construed or held to affect the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar or of the subsidiary or minor coins.

What is a fair construction of these provisions? It is this: That all these private debts now payable in silver at 100 cents on the dollar shall, after the passage of this bill, be paid in gold coin or its equivalent, and if silver is to be a legal tender under this bill it must be a legal tender at its gold value and not its coinage value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, no man can tell what the effect of this bill will be upon the two dollars. If a great and sudden exportation of gold, or a change in the condition of our monetary system from the passage of this bill, or any other cause should send gold to a premium and silver to a discount, the debtor to-day who has a right to pay his obligations in silver at 100 cents on the dollar must pay it in gold or the equivalent of gold, though it should take $125 or $150 in silver to pay $100 of his indebtedness.

I regret that I have not more time to dwell upon this section; but there are so many mean things in this bill outside of this section that I must pass it by.

Mr. Chairman, while it is impossible even for a Republican to tell what will take place under this bill, we can see after reading its provisions what may take place. This bill transfers into this division of issue and redemption every silver dollar in the Treasury, the greenbacks, the silver certificates, the Treasury notes, and all the silver dollars, including the dollars coined under the act of 1890, which after the passage of this bill will have no duty to perform in the monetary system of our Government, for the notes issued on account of them will be redeemed in gold coin. [Loud applause.]

Under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury will have power to withdraw from the circulation of the country every dollar of greenbacks, amounting to $346,000,000; every dollar of Treasury notes under the law of 1890, amounting in round numbers to $100,000,000; every silver certificate now issued, amounting to about $400,000,000, and over $800,000,000 of the currency of the country can be locked up out of the circulation under this bill without another dollar more of gold in the country than you had in the beginning, and you know it. It is no answer to say that for every paper dollar that goes in a gold dollar will be paid out.

When the gold dollar is received to redeem the paper dollar it is taken out of circulation. You must get your gold to redeem this paper currency from increased revenues or the sale of bonds, and it comes out of our money in circulation in either case. So you will have no more gold than you had in the beginning. If you can not see contraction in this, you may be able to see contraction in the Republican party after the passage of this measure. It is too clear for any dispute that our present volume of currency may be contracted over $800,000,000 under this bill, and we ought to know from the experience of past panics what such a contraction means.

Such an unfortunate condition will make money scarce and higher and property and wages lower; it will bring such misery and distress upon the people that they will again rise in their majesty and power to condemn the party that brought upon them these great afflictions. But, Mr. Chairman, this is not all under this bill; it is possible for the Secretary of the Treasury to lock up in his vaults every silver dollar by exchanging gold for it. And as you may buy the same gold a dozen times to accomplish this redemption or exchange, it does not follow that you will have any more gold coin in the country than you had in the beginning.

But if the Secretary should choose the other course and decide to again pay out silver dollars received in exchange for gold coin, then the silver dollar, under this bill, may be used to accomplish the wicked purpose of stealing gold from the Treasury and forcing a new issue of bonds, just as the greenback has done for years under the policy of the gold standard; and I call the attention of all Gold Democrats to the fact that we still have this endless chain, only of silver instead of paper. And the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that when the holder of silver had the right to exchange it for gold he would lose his desire to do so is no answer to the contention I make. When they had the right to exchange greenbacks for gold, they were not satisfied with the mere right, but took their greenbacks to the Treasury to get out gold, not because they liked gold better than greenbacks, but because they liked bonds better than either; and the same mischief may be practiced in this bill by using silver dollars instead of greenbacks.

I want to say to the Gold Democrats on this floor, if you want to vote against your party and with the Republicans on this measure, then look only at its first section. But if you desire to vote with the Democratic party in this House, and are hunting for good causes to do that, then, sirs, whatever may be your opinion on silver, you can find many strong and valid reasons as Democrats for voting against this bill if you will only look beyond its first section.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]—and I hope he will not consider me out of order for attempting to talk on the bill itself—the distinguished gentleman from Ohio criticizes members on this side of the Chamber for endeavoring to discuss the free-coinage question and not confining themselves to the bill before the House. Yet I submit that from the beginning to the end of his remarks he nowhere comes within cannon shot of this measure. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Of course we on this side of the House did not expect the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, who is always burdened with the weighty affairs of the Administration, to go into a detailed discussion like other gentlemen whose burdens are less onerous on this floor. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio criticizes us for discussing free coinage and the Chicago platform, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. McCREARY] criticizes the members on this side of the House for not indorsing the Chicago platform every time they get an opportunity.

Mr. Chairman, there is just this difference between a Democrat and a Republican: A Republican is subject to such frequent changes on the money question it is important that he should express his opinion, not only at every session of Congress, but between times as often as possible, in order that his people may know where he stands [laughter on the Democratic side], while a Democrat has honest convictions and is not turned from them by every change of the wind.

It was only in February, 1891, at Toledo, Ohio, that President McKinley, in criticising ex-President Cleveland's opposition to silver, said:

During all these years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own great products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored, even before his inauguration to office, to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards, and to the end of his Administration, persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the terms of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear.

He would have increased the value of money and decreased the value of everything else—money the master, and everything else the servant. He was not thinking of the "poor" then. He had left their side. He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these, professing to stand guard over the poor and lowly. Was there ever more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption? He believes that poverty is a blessing to be promoted and encouraged, and that a shrinkage in the value of everything but money is a national benediction.

Behold this great Republican champion of the silver dollar, as then parading in sheep's clothing; but see him now in the true livery of the wolf, following as closely as a child ever followed its mother, in what he now considers the golden footsteps of Mr. Cleveland.

Let this Benedict Arnold in finance forever stand convicted by his own eloquent and forcible words.

Mr. Chairman, in order that this severe indictment presented by Mr. McKinley against Mr. Cleveland for trying to demonetize silver may be adapted to present men and present conditions, let it be amended by striking out the name of the old defendant, Grover Cleveland, and inserting the name of the new defendant, William McKinley, and by striking out the name of the old prosecutor, William McKinley, and inserting the name of the new prosecutor, William J. Bryan. Then, "Your Honor," we are ready for trial.

Mr. Chairman, if I had time, I would be glad to express my convictions in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and emphasize the fact, if possible, that I am stronger for that proposition to-day than ever before. But, sir, you can not deceive the country; this is not a contest against the free coinage of silver. It is a contest in favor of national banks against the greenbacks, the Treasury notes, all the paper currency of the Government, and every silver dollar now in circulation, over 500,000,000 silver dollars already coined, defended by McKinley the First and destroyed by McKinley the Second. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, why this reckless assault upon all our money of the country except the gold and bank notes? Does it not show that one of the main purposes of this bill is to take away from the people's Government the right and power to coin money and issue currency and turn it over to the national banks? Sir, as a Representative of the people upon this floor, I am unwilling to assist in turning this high function of Government over to these money changers. I am unwilling to make the people of this country dependent upon the sweet will and selfish interests of these banking corporations for a sufficient volume of money with which to transact their business.

It is un-Democratic, it is un-Republican, it is un-American in principle. Once this great power is completely in the hands of these corporations, and it will be much harder for the people to regain it than to retain it now. You give to these selfish corporations the great and dangerous power to make the people's money, and, by uniting with other great trusts and combinations to carry out their own purposes, they will soon be making Congressmen, Senators, and Presidents, and I am not sure they could do much worse in making Presidents than the people have for the last few years. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the Republicans are encouraged to retire the greenbacks and destroy all our silver dollars at this time by the increased volume of gold coin now in the United States. What has brought about this increase of gold and with it an increase of prices? It is due in part to the large increase in the annual output of gold for the last few years and to the large importation of gold caused by a large balance of trade in favor of the United States. But what assurance have we that such conditions will continue? Who can look into the secret chambers of the earth and say that this large production of gold will continue? Our experience with new gold discoveries in the past proves just to the contrary. And what assurance have we that the large balance of trade in favor of the United States will continue? This is due more to short crops in other countries and abundant crops in our own than any other cause. What right have we to expect that the Almighty will continue to send his famines upon other nations and his blessings of bounty upon ours?

Mr. Chairman, the Republicans in this discussion have had much to say about our large volume of gold and the present prosperity of the country. No one rejoices more than myself to see the people prosperous under any and every Administration. But whatever of prosperity we do enjoy at this time is due largely to conditions over which the Republican party had no control. They will hardly claim credit for the world's large increase in the annual production of gold or for our abundant crops, which have done so much to increase our balance of trade and our importations of gold from other countries. It is true that the Republican tariff laws have created trusts all over the country, and by their selfish combinations they have greatly advanced the prices of many manufactured articles. But if the country enjoys any genuine prosperity, it has come not on account of the legislation or Administration of the Republican party, but in spite of them. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Conditions caused by the present and recent wars have also had their effect upon prices; but, Mr. Chairman, the fact that we have an increase in our volume of gold, and with it an increase of prices, only proves that which the advocates of free coinage have always claimed—that an increase in the volume of money would give us better prices and better times, and whether that increase comes from gold or silver coin makes no difference. But our present prices do not depend upon our gold alone, but all our silver dollars and government currency are assisting gold in the various channels of trade. Now, if under the provisions of this bill all our silver dollars, our greenbacks, and other currency should be withdrawn from circulation, will this not at once so increase the demand for gold as to greatly increase its value and reduce the value of everything else, even if our present supply of gold should remain with us?

But, Mr. Chairman, we have no right to assume that our present supply of gold will continue for any great length of time. The production of gold at the mines is always uncertain. Our large balance of trade may, under a wise Providence and in spite of President McKinley, be turned against us, and, whether this should occur or not, we must remember other great countries are scrambling for gold to maintain the gold standard. And conditions are liable to arise at any time in some of these gold-standard nations to suddenly increase the demand for gold and cause much of our own supply to disappear. In fact, we are threatened with such conditions now. Gold is no respecter of persons or nations, and will go in the future, as it has in the past, to the highest bidder.

Our gold does not belong to the Government, but to its private holders, and they will permit it to leave us whenever it is to their interest, though it should produce a panic in our own country. So we may have plenty of gold to-day, and to-morrow it may take the wings of the wind and fly to the uttermost parts of the world; and if conditions should arise that would take from us our gold and leave us with the standard only [laughter on the Democratic side], how much better to have silver dollars than no dollars at all. It is this uncertainty which makes it unsafe to depend upon gold alone as our primary money and calls for both metals in our coinage system. And our currency, of whatever kind or volume, is certainly safer and sounder when based upon both metals for its redemption than it is based on one alone, which is liable to be diminished at any time by causes over which we have no control.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill certainly destroys all hope of bimetalism by international agreement, and international bimetalism must be entombed in that great cemetery already filled with the broken promises of the Republican party. But, Mr. Chairman, there will be at least one virtue in the passage of this measure. It will prove to the country what hypocrites the Republican leaders were in 1896, when they pretended to favor bimetalism—silver coin as well as gold—in order to secure the votes of thousands and thousands of good Silver Republicans in the West and South, who really believed that their party was acting in good faith and trying to bring about bimetalism. This bill will certainly be a disappointment to many of the men who have helped to place you in power.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that such an odious measure was ever prepared for the consideration of Congress, but if it had to be prepared, how becoming in its authors to go just as far east as possible for its creation; how becoming it was that this Republican committee should assemble just as near the feet of the British Crown as the eastern coast of our Republic would permit, in order that they might receive not only the advice of the bondholders of New England but of the agents of the money lords of Old England as well.

Mr. Chairman, some of the provisions of this bill exhibit all that selfish greed that characterizes the vital force in Republican politics to-day; it is full of burdens to the debtor classes of this country and ought to be defeated. But, sir, there is this consolation to this side of the House and to the country: If this bill is not beaten it will beat the Republican party and make William J. Bryan President in 1900. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS] has yielded to me only one minute. Can I take four minutes of the time of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Have we that much left in this hour?

The CHAIRMAN. No; there is but one minute remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes out of the next hour, so as to give him four minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY], in the course of his remarks, used this language:

Do you know that this man Taylor who is elected governor of Kentucky would not have come within 40,000 votes of it if it had not been for the men that were for honest and fair politics in the State of Kentucky and did not want corrupt methods ingrafted upon the State?

I take that from the report of the Official Reporter. I regret the necessity of airing the differences of the Democrats of Kentucky upon this floor, but since the gentleman has begun it, I meet the issue fairly, and I desire to congratulate my friend on his boldness in declaring his position during the last campaign in Kentucky, although he waits until nearly sixty days after the election and comes 800 miles from the scene of action to do so. Frank avowal of a conviction is not characteristic of the gentleman, and it is a matter of satisfaction to learn that he has not only made up his mind as to who ought to be governor of Kentucky, but is willing to depart from his usual course sufficiently to avow that conviction.

There were 191,000 votes cast for Mr. Goebel in Kentucky. According to the gentleman, these are the men and this the number of voters opposed to honest and fair politics in the State. Less than 15,000 votes were cast for Brown, the bolting Democrat. I leave the House to judge not only who voted for honesty and fairness in politics in that race, but also to judge of the quality of the gentleman's gratitude to the people who have four times honored him with a seat on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman represents the sentiment neither of Kentucky nor of his district in the remarks I have quoted from his speech, and I assure him his constituents will testify their estimate of his course at the earliest possible moment. Sir, the bolting in Kentucky was largely a matter of dollars and cents, bought and paid for by the most gigantic, as it was the most oppressive and most infamous, corporation that ever found lodgment south of Mason and Dixon's line. Its paid attorneys for a stipulated fee made speeches in which they traduced, slandered, and maligned from one end of the State to the other a man whose shoes they were unworthy to loosen. And yet Mr. Goebel received 30,000 more votes than any Democrat who ever aspired to a public place in that Commonwealth. I challenge the gentleman to point out one dishonorable act in either the public or private life of William Goebel. If the gentleman means to say that those who voted the Democratic ticket in Kentucky last fall stood for dishonesty and corruption in politics, his statement is gratuitously and wholly untrue.

Just a moment, Mr. Chairman, as to this man Goebel who is so much maligned and slandered. He comes from the humblest parentage, with the heritage of no great name or fortune to speed him on his way. He is yet in the meridian of his manhood and stands the first citizen of his Commonwealth and the governor of that great old State. I use the word advisedly, because before the buds burst on a tree in Kentucky he will be the chief executive, and we will have routed that nefarious gang who won their certificate of election by corruption, fraud, and rascality. Mr. Goebel has honored his people as they have honored him. Clean-limbed as a racer, young, brave, and determined, he has never hesitated to break a lance upon the shield of corruption or wrong wherever he has found it. So soon as he had attained the requisite age he was sent to the upper chamber of the general assembly of Kentucky, and no sooner had his feet touched the carpet of that historic chamber than he placed himself close in touch with the people of the State, and has been true to them upon every great issue.

From the lusty loins of that Commonwealth have sprung many of the nation's good and great, but she never sent forth a nobler champion of the right, a greater tribune of the people, a more gallant and incorruptible gentleman than William Goebel. His fight in Kentucky was not against Republicanism. It did not represent a square, fair battle between the two parties. It was a contest between the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company upon one side and the plain people of the Commonwealth upon the other. They sent their hirelings from the mouth of Sandy to Mill's Point, and for a stipulated fee they traduced, slandered, and maligned a man whose public and whose private career was above reproach in the esteem of all decent people. If he had been a bad man, if he had represented anything but the best sentiments of the people of the Commonwealth, why, I ask my colleague, should he have received 30,000 more votes than were ever before given any Democratic aspirant for public place in Kentucky?

I regret the necessity, Mr. Chairman, of washing our linen in Kentucky on the floor of this House, but I do not intend that the party which has honored me with a commission on this floor shall be slandered, traduced, or misrepresented, though it be by a man I esteem, holding a commission from the same people that I hold one from.

The gentleman does not speak the sentiment of his district. Mr. Taylor has not been elected governor of Kentucky. An incorruptible board of canvassers, obeying the law, a thing which Republicans seldom ever do when party advantage has weight in the scale, has given him his certificate, but when the case comes before a judicial tribunal, as it will in a few days, and the calcium light is turned on, the citizens of every party will know that Mr. Goebel was fairly elected as he will be fairly inaugurated governor of the State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These are the facts. I court no controversy on this subject, yet I fear none. Armed with right I will maintain the position of the Democratic party of my State here, as I tried to do there. I shall say nothing of the unfortunate attitude of my friend; he has the right to take any position he sees proper in this House, as he had in Kentucky, but he has no right to question the attitude of gentlemen that differ with him upon that question. This man Goebel is the most maligned, misrepresented, and slandered man I ever knew in my life. He was vituperated time and again, slandered, and misrepresented by mercenary penny-a-liners and hired attorneys.

Mr. SULZER. They are afraid of him.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes; they are afraid of him.

Mr. BERRY. What has New York got to do with it?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He has been slandered.

Mr. SULZER. He is a good fighter.

Mr. BERRY. They had to get outside people—

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. We had no outside people, we needed none, except those Democrats, those tribunes of the people, who always go to the rescue when there is a fight against corporate greed. No man will deny Goebel's ability. No man will question his integrity; and if my colleague will state to this House one single act that would impair his official or private character or is reprehensible or unbecoming a brave Kentuckian, I will withdraw what I have said and remain in my place stultified. No sort of question was made against the man except that he was of iron nerve, one who scorned his foes and loved his friends, and that has made him dear to the people of Kentucky. I have said this, Mr. Chairman, to vindicate not only the position of myself and colleagues on this floor, but of 191,000 Democrats of Kentucky who will approve every statement I have uttered from my place. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BERRY. May I have a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

[Mr. BERRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I think the gentleman—

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] may have further time.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I want to thank the generous spirit which prompts the gentleman on the other side of the Chamber. I will try to say something that will be grateful to them. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] that there was not a policeman in the Louisville convention that debarred any honest, decent Democrat going on the floor who had the credentials from his party and from his county. Any man could go there. A few thugs and toughs were excluded. There were a few Republicans who wore upon their sleeves so-called Democracy, but in their minds were prepared to knife the party, and they were properly excluded from the convention.

I do not like everything that transpired there; I do not like everything that transpires here, but I am not going to bolt my seat in the American Congress because I find oppression and wrong and tyranny on the other side of the Chamber. I stood in my place and tried to serve my people in that convention, as I stand in my place and serve them here. The gentleman says I am as corrupt as Goebel. Indeed I am; but weighed in that scale with Goebel and myself on one side and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] on the other, and the people of Kentucky to judge, we know full well what the verdict would be.

Mr. BERRY. We will let that be determined in the future.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. It will be determined in the future.

Mr. BERRY. You will have to abide by it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I shall abide by it. The probability of my remaining in Congress rests with the people, but if my people ever say that I must remain at home, I will stay there—a Democrat that never scratched his ticket and never betrayed a trust. They have honored me far beyond my deserts, but if the gentleman comes to Congress again from the Sixth district, he will never be indorsed by the 6,000 majority of that Congressional district.

Mr. BERRY. Do not become a prophet.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am a prophet to that extent. I want to say to the Republicans of this House that the conditions in Kentucky are not as bad as stated. Lay not the flattering unction to your soul that you will reap any benefit from what took place there.

Kentucky Democrats may sometimes do things they ought not to do, but they will never go over to the Republican party, and in 1900 Kentucky will go Democratic by the greatest majority ever given in the history of the State.

I regret that I felt compelled to make this defense in the presence of our enemy in this House.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. In the discussion of a currency bill I do not think gentlemen on this side ought to air their differences for the enjoyment of the Republicans. [Laughter.] I do not know much about the Kentucky campaign, but I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is one that the Chair does not care to decide. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] is recognized.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I bespeak the indulgence of the members of the House to the extent of permitting me to continue my remarks to-day without interruption. I do not think there will be any occasion for interruption, as I do not purpose discussing politics. I do not believe by any means that our Democratic friends are absolutely good, but I have no disposition to-day to set their sins before them. I would not like to say it myself on account of my habitual guarded discretion, but another has said that the Almighty has put his hand on the Democratic party, and the episode just witnessed in this House affords some evidence of its truth. And if it be true, I have no disposition to interfere. [Laughter.] I believe with Senator Benton, of old bullion fame. He did not entertain a morbid affection for John C. Calhoun, and after the death of the latter a friend said to him, "Senator, what have you to say now of Mr. Calhoun?" The Senator replied, "Not anything; not a solitary thing. When the Almighty puts his hand on a man I take mine off." [Laughter.]

It seems to me a happy providence in our national affairs that has brought us upon such auspicious conditions for those repairs in our financial and banking laws which have pressed with extreme urgency upon public attention for some years. Unfortunately indeed has been the situation of those who have been endeavoring for some years to make suitable reforms in our monetary system. They seem to have incurred the disfavor of Providence and invited a confusion of tongues whose only prototype is the lingual curse of Babel. At last we have escaped from this curse, we have recovered a common language, can discourse and agree together like rational creatures. This makes action possible.

With business and industries at high-water mark, with all our people employed, with wages advancing, with prosperity and content singing with every craft and confidence smiling in every face, with a thousand millions of gold in the country, four hundred millions, almost, in the Treasury, and probably three hundred and fifty millions in the banks, was there ever in all our history so auspicious a moment for the correction of those defects in our financial system that time and experience have revealed?

The hour solicits us, a sense of need invites us, and patriotism commands us. Let us not falter.

HYPERCRITICISM.

Earnestly seeking an opportunity to correct the errors our predecessors have committed is no concession to that hypercriticism which in recent years has sought to cover our financial system with ridicule and bring it into popular contempt. A few carpers and cavers have indulged in criticisms as severe as they are senseless. They rival the famous strictures of Tooke, one of the most noted economists of his time, on the Bank of England. In his great work on the history of prices he said:

The Bank of England is one of the most wanton, ill-advised, pedantic, and rash pieces of legislation that has ever come within my observation.

Of course nobody took him seriously, and a half a century has not prevailed against the Bank of England. Criticisms of that character carry about as much weight as Sidney Smith's complaint of the solar system, when he said to his friend Jeffrey—

D—n the solar system. Bad light, planets too distant, posteried with comets, feeble contrivance. Could make a better with ease.

I do not mean to make any concession to this babble against our banking system in the efforts I make to improve it. Salmon P. Chase made an accurate forecast when he said to an eminent gentleman after completing the national-bank act:

I have completed to-day a very great thing. I have finished the national banking act. It will be a blessing to the country long after I am dead.

I believe with the late Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, when he said:

The present national banking system, in my judgment, and in that of many thinking men, statesmen, and financiers, is the best that the world has ever seen.

But while I believe it is the best the wit of man has ever heretofore devised for our country, I think it can be made better and we ought not to be content with any system that is worse than the best possible.

BOGY OF CONSISTENCY.

Unlike some honorable members, I give my adhesion to this measure without a string to it. My devotion is not discounted by mental reservations. I do not have to reorganize my conceptions of the subject or reconsider former views to support this bill, for its substantial propositions are in the line of my thought and my effort for years. But what on earth is more commendable than a change of mind in the light of a new day. It is pitiful to witness the efforts of some men to be consistent. I have listened in this debate to animadversion upon the inconsistency of men in not always holding the same views. If we did, we would soon be a nation of fools. Consistency is the bogey of little minds, to which infant statesmen and feeble philosophers pay homage. What has a great soul to do with consistency more than with his shadow on the wall? It is the rule of wisdom to speak to-day what we think and to-morrow speak again what we think, though it contradict every utterance of yesterday. Every great question must come to the touchstone of the present. To-day, and not last year, is the judgment day for this financial measure.

BUSINESS MEASURE.

The bill before us is a great business measure calculated to keep upon the present solid foundation the welfare and prosperity of the whole country. It has a twofold purpose: First, the money standard; second, the better adaptation of our currency system to the requirements of trade and industry; and all of its provisions are subsidiary to one or the other aim. Its first and most important object is to affirm the existing standard of value and provide for its maintenance.

WHY AFFIRM THE EXISTING STANDARD?

It has been pertinently asked, "Why affirm an existing standard?"

The answer is not far to seek. And in answering I forbear making any argument in support of the wisdom of that standard, for I cordially indorse what has been so ably said on that subject by those who have preceded me, notably my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

In the first place, it is desirable, for the sake of unity, clearness, and convenience, to have the declaration of the standard reproduced in connection with the provisions for its maintenance. This is the commonest occurrence in our legislation. A single instance out of a great number may serve as an illustration. Section 8 of the act of March 3, 1843, declares what shall constitute the standard for gold and silver coins, requiring both to be nine-tenths fine. The same identical section is reproduced as section 13 of the act of February 12, 1873, so that it would be found in connection with the provisions which immediately follow in section 14 relating to the unit of value and the various coins authorized.

But there is another reason. Our monetary legislation for half a century has been an evolution developed by accretions at long intervals, as amendments were suggested by time and experience. The system has grown in a fashion not greatly distinguished for unity or logical coherence. It has therefore lent itself to varying constructions under the bias of party feeling or the exigencies of politics. The result has been that diverse views and purposes have led to diverse interpretations of law, and out of the vicissitudes of our financial affairs, our trials, dangers, and catastrophes narrowly escaped has come a degree of uncertainty as to what might occur in possible contingencies in the practical administration of the system. This is disquieting to the public mind. We know, as has recently been said, in matters monetary the state of mind is as important as the state of fact. In such a juncture it is obviously the dictate of wisdom to remove the doubt, clarify the situation, and put the public mind at ease.

We agree, no doubt, that it is requisite to the general tranquility and prosperity that we should not only be able to maintain the gold standard but that the people have faith that we will do so, and nothing can be so assuring to the public mind as to see the purpose of the people clothed in the vitality and majesty of public law. The distinct and unequivocal declaration of the "standard" in this measure in connection with the well-conceived and clearly expressed means of maintaining it therein contained constitute that complete and final assurance which produces absolute quietude and composes the mind to a state of tranquillity.

MONEY UNIT.

The bill declares that the standard unit of value shall be the dollar and shall consist of $25\frac{1}{10}$ grains of gold nine-tenths fine. I have been asked, "What is a unit of value, the standard money unit?" On a former occasion I submitted some reflections on the subject of the "money unit," and I take the liberty of reproducing them at this point for the consideration of those interested in such reflections:

A numerical unit is a pure abstraction. It is expressed by a figure. We manipulate figures without respect to commodities of any kind. We can say three times three are nine without considering the concrete denotement of the numbers. It may be one or more of anything you choose, as one dollar or one apple. A numerical unit is not a creature of the law, but of the mind. A single thing is one by nature and not by legal enactment. So we can not reach the legal contents of the expression "money unit" from the merely numerical side.

When we advance a step toward the reality and add to the numerical abstraction the word "dollar," we have a concrete unit. Every unit of measure or weight or value must be a concrete unit; a unit expressed by a determinate amount or quantity or weight of the thing to be measured or weighed or estimated, to be taken as a standard of comparison for other determinate amounts, quantities, or weight of like kind, and without which no kind of exchange but primitive barter could take place.

A money unit, then, contains this group of ideas, namely:

First. A numerical abstraction—a symbol for purposes of notation.

Second. A determinate weight of precious metal or metals, as the case may be, which is fixed by law.

Third. The denomination "dollar," also a creature of the law, which expresses the value of the predetermined weight of precious metal which constitutes the unit.

The value inheres in the metal and not in the form of it. A certain number of grains of gold or silver in the form of a cube are just as effectually a unit of value as if in the form of a disk, for value resides in substance and not in form.

The struck coin is a thing apart. It is not the "money unit," but a thing of convenience in exchange, a certificate of weight and fineness. If it coincides with the unit in value, that is an incident which gives it no character different from other coins excepting in denomination. The unit, as a mere symbol, is only the money of the mind. The struck coin is the piece for payment, and contains the value which its name expresses. The former is in view when a contract of sale is made; the latter only comes into requisition when it is executed. One is for the arithmetic of exchange, to afford terms in which values can be expressed; the other is to effect exchanges of commodities whose value has been reduced to expression in the terms of the unit.

We have thus arrived at our definition of "money unit," namely, a given number of grains of precious metal possessing a determinate value, named "dollar" or "unit," by comparison with which the denominations of money are regulated, and in the terms of which, or the fractions or multiples thereof, general values are expressed.

GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS.

We find in this bill a distinct declaration that the interest-bearing obligations of the Government and the United States notes and Treasury notes are payable in gold. The importance of this declaration may not be appreciated by those at home and abroad who have implicit faith in the honor and integrity of the American people, and there are millions of such.

Mr. Rothschild, the great London banker and financier, once paid the United States a handsome compliment. When he was asked which he would prefer, American obligations payable in coin or in gold, he said:

I would rather have them payable in coin, for, at the rate gold is being produced now, and in anticipation of the enlarged production in the near future, it is not impossible that silver may be the better money when the bonds mature. At any rate, I know that the United States, as long as it enjoys the option, will always pay its obligations in the best money in the world.

On the other hand, there are those who are haunted by the ghost that troubled Sydney Smith. They live in the twilight of distrust and suspicion. It is not pleasant to refer to anything as mean and low down as the calumny of Sydney Smith, but he illustrated a class of people who must be reckoned with in the general treatment. In his letter on American debts, Mr. Smith observed that

It was sad to see us rejected by every state in Europe as a nation with whom no contract could be made because none would be kept; that we were deficient in the elements of good faith, a people who preferred any load of infamy, however great, to any pressure of taxation, however small.

It is doubtful if a man lives to-day who entertains any such opinion of us as Mr. Smith, expressed in the spasms of a convulsion. But upon the faint-hearted, feeble-minded, suspicion-haunted, ghost-seeing mortals this declaration will have a salutary influence, for it is calculated to produce quietude and composure in times of agitation and alarm, and is by no means the least important provision in the bill.

LEGAL TENDERS.

It is, moreover, one of the excellencies of the bill that this is accomplished without disturbing the legal-tender quality of our silver coins and paper currency. It is desirable, on grounds of the most obvious reasoning, that some portion of the paper currency with which exchanges are effected should possess the legal-tender quality. In the transaction of commercial business it not infrequently happens that tenders of payment are to be made. Such tenders, to be legally effective, must be made in legal-tender money. Without a form of currency easily obtainable and conveniently portable for such use, the people would be subjected to extreme inconvenience.

This was fully realized by a gentleman in New York who was required to make a tender of $20,000. He was unable for a time to obtain that amount of greenbacks and was confronted by the necessity of carrying to the place of tender $20,000 in gold. He succeeded at length in obtaining the currency, but the incident emphasized the necessity in a commercial nation of having legal-tender money other than coin for the convenience of the people. Our legal-tender notes occupy the same position in our currency as the Bank of England notes do in the currency of Great Britain. The latter are legal-tenders in all commercial dealings between individuals, but redeemable in gold at the counter of the bank as our legal tenders are at the counter of the Treasury.

SEGREGATION OF THE RESERVE.

The proposal to segregate the gold redemption fund and to keep it separate and apart from the current funds of the Treasury is a practical and sensible means of protecting the reserve which, with lapse of time, has grown more and more acceptable to the public.

Chief among the difficulties we have encountered in the maintenance of the Treasury gold reserve has been the use of it to supplement a depleted revenue. It is obvious enough under that practice that a diminishing revenue must lead to a depleted reserve, and that to an impairment of public confidence in the ability of the Government to redeem its pledges by maintaining the gold standard.

It is not anticipated that the conditions from which our difficulties a few years ago sprang, as naturally as fruit from the blossom, will recur; not, at least, as long as we are able to guard the administration of the Government against those delinquencies which produced the distresses of the country. Yet it is wise to provide against possible contingencies by making it easy to encounter any stress of weather that may overtake us in the future.

Any deficiency in revenue under this bill will be supplied by taxation or by the use of the credit of the nation in borrowing to meet the contingency. The gold reserve can not be treasured upon and is not likely to be reduced to that apprehensive limit which disturbs the public mind and excites alarm. It is the business of the current revenues to meet the current expenditures, and the barrier between the general fund in the Treasury and the gold redemption fund should be impassable except for an exchange of forms of money for the convenience of the latter.

RETENTION OF GREENBACKS.

Nothing could be more excellent or more consonant with common sense and right reason than the provision authorizing the retention in the Treasury of United States notes redeemed in gold until exchanged for gold. The practical utility of this provision is only exceeded by its absolute justice to Government and people. If any untoward conditions should overtake us in the future, this provision will prevent the recurrence of the "endless chain" which worked such disaster in the years of unhappy memory. To continue exposing ourselves to the possibility of being compelled to suspend gold payment or continue borrowing gold to meet an endless drainage is scarcely consistent with sound statesmanship. We have had the experience of that wasting process, and we do not invite its recurrence. We have realized how vain and futile the task—as vain as that of the daughters of Danaus, doomed to draw water from a well and pour it eternally into a perforated cask. The absurdity of the process, as well as its danger, admonishes us to take arms against its possible recurrence by killing with all possible dispatch what was called the auriferous tapeworm that wriggled back and forth between Wall street and the Treasury.

Nor is there any danger of the volume of our legal-tender paper being seriously diminished under this provision. The operation of the provisions of this bill when it shall have become law will be so salutary, so reassuring to the public mind, will so far allay fears and dispel doubts of the purpose and ability of the United States to redeem all its obligations in the best money and to keep all its currency equally good, that a preference for paper will so widely prevail that an inconsiderable amount will ever be presented for redemption.

UNWARRANTED ASSUMPTION.

A singular assumption has been advanced that this is a comprehensive scheme for getting our national currency out of the way and issuing bonds to keep up the gold reserve while the legal tender remains in the reserve fund, being replaced by bank notes. Some penetrating mind has suggested an operation like this: Fifty million of notes will be taken to the reserve and that amount of gold taken out. That reduces the gold reserve by $50,000,000. To replenish the gold $50,000,000 of bonds must be sold, and then $50,000,000 goes back into the redemption fund without anything being paid out, and then we have contraction. Repeat the operation a few times and all the legal tender notes are in the Treasury and the gold out, and the paper money of the country is supplied by the banks. Now, it takes a genius to conceive a scheme like that, but no man in a lucid interval would believe that anybody would have a motive for working such a scheme if it was possible. I do not say that there is not credulity enough in some quarters to believe it despite the dead weight of argument against it, for some minds are like the pupil of the eye, the more light you throw upon them the more they contract.

I think in one of George Eliot's works there are some comments on the mental characteristics of the donkey. She says the distinguishing characteristic of the donkey's mind is its aptness to arrive at conclusions inversely to the strength of the evidence. And I think she adds that it argues a higher intellectual acumen on the part of the donkey than the direct sequence. I mean no reflection upon anyone, but desire to emphasize the fact that we can not make an argument or a financial system that will satisfy any mind that is superior to reason.

It may be said in reply to this wonderful scheme that, on the hypothesis that legal-tender notes would go in in large amounts for gold, the latter would become very abundant in the channels of trade and would be paid into the Treasury in large amounts in taxes and revenue—90 per cent of the customs duties are now paid in gold—and the Secretary, under section 4, would at once exchange his legal tender for that gold and the legal tenders would go out into circulation again, and if they came back they would go out again in the same manner, thus keeping up the gold reserve without the necessity for issuing bonds. The assumption carries the idea that the Secretary of the Treasury would issue bonds to replenish the gold reserve when there was an abundance of the yellow metal in the general fund of the Treasury transferable for that purpose, an assumption which is wholly inadmissible and without warrant in the terms of the bill. But the fact is, no such scheme would ever be set in operation. It is not consonant with reason and common sense. Neither the people nor the banks wish to handle gold unnecessarily. It is inconvenient, subject to loss by abrasion, and altogether undesirable.

BUT ONE CONSTRUCTION POSSIBLE.

This provision of the bill will admit of but one construction. The Secretary is required to maintain the gold reserve. How? First, by transferring to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. That means the transfer of gold, for any other kind of money would not replenish the gold reserve. Second, he may exchange any of the funds in the division of issue and redemption for other funds which may be in the general fund of the Treasury. That means an exchange for gold funds, for no other would maintain the gold reserve.

Then he is required to use the reserve to maintain the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government, and when necessary to this end he may exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States. The money so redeemed or exchanged shall be retained in said redemption fund until exchanged for an equivalent amount of the coin in which it was redeemed, except as heretofore in this section provided. Now, what was "heretofore" provided? Why, clearly, the exchange of any funds in the division of issue and redemption for any other funds in the general fund of the Treasury. And all these means of maintaining the gold reserve and the parity of all our money are to be exhausted before recourse is had to the issue of bonds.

Now, under these provisions, whatever kind of money may be redeemed in gold, it is not possible for the gold reserve to require the issue of bonds for its maintenance as long as there is a dollar of gold in the general fund of the Treasury that can be transferred to the reserve.

The assumption upon which the argument proceeds, that large amounts of legal-tender notes would be presented for redemption, is contradicted by every day's history from the 1st of January, 1879, down to the hour when demagogues pnt out the lights and the American people stumbled in the dark. Under normal conditions in the past greenbacks have remained in the hands of the banks and the people. Over $300,000,000 of them are now in the their hands. On the first day the resumption act went into operation the current of gold, not paper, set toward the Treasury. At the close of business on Monday, the 2d day of January, 1879, this message came to the Secretary from the office of the subtreasurer in New York:

One hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars of notes presented for coin, and $100,000 of gold for notes.

For many years our Treasury was richer in gold than any other in the world. A depleted reserve was a thing undreamed of for fourteen years; and now, after the lapse of but thirty-four months from the Republican restoration, from the people's recovery of the dominion of reason and patriotism, we have more gold in the Treasury than we know what to do with, and might have much more if we had the paper to exchange for it. Last year it is estimated that $25,000,000 of gold was tendered the Treasury for paper which could not be supplied, and the appearance of greenbacks at the counter of the Treasury demanding gold is as rare as bluebirds in winter.

SILVER DOLLARS SHOULD BE EXCHANGEABLE FOR GOLD.

In the maintenance of the gold reserve the Secretary is authorized, as I have already suggested, to exchange one form of money for another. This provision is not as ample as I would have it. I would require the Secretary to exchange gold for silver dollars when demanded by the holder. I agree on this point with my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], and this is no new birth in the family of my financial ideas. Six years ago on this floor, in the debate on the bill to coin the seigniorage, I said:

This Government ought not to issue a single dollar of less value than a gold dollar that is not redeemable at the option of the holder in something of the value of 100 cents. We take 49 cents' worth of silver and stamp it with the image and superscription of the United States. We declare it worth 100 cents. We sanctify it with the holy legend, "In God we trust," and send it forth armed with full legal-tender power and without provision for redemption, to pay 100 cents' worth of debt. One act of legislation is pressing upon us with extreme urgency now—that we either provide for putting a dollar's worth of silver in the coined dollar or make it redeemable in a gold dollar.

These were my views six years ago, and I am of the same opinion still. Every form of money in use in the United States is redeemable, directly or indirectly, in gold, except the standard silver dollar. Down to 1878 the only coin ever minted in the United States of less intrinsic value than its face was deprived of its full legal-tender power and denied the free privilege of the mint and made redeemable in lawful money.

So in this legislation, for the sake of unity in its provisions, of the principle involved, and of fidelity to our pledges to maintain sound money and to clothe our purpose with the vitality of public law, I would make the gold and silver dollars interchangeable.

SOUND MONEY.

What is sound money? Money is sound when its intrinsic or commercial value corresponds with its coinage value and is equal in purchasing power to that used by the leading commercial nations with which we deal, or is convertible at the option of the holder into such standard-value money. Every dollar in use in this country meets the requirements of that definition except the silver dollar. While we are reforming the errors of the past I would remove that blemish. No harm can come from such a provision. But this I need not elaborate. I find in the North American Review for December an able article from the pen of my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in support of this proposition, in which he shows clearly it would be no menace to the Treasury. He says:

Our stock of silver is scattered among 75,000,000 people throughout the whole vast area of our country. It constitutes the current money of exchange. It has to do with all the myriad transactions of business life. It would be almost impossible to withdraw it from circulation in any substantial amount. That could only be done at all by paying a premium for it. It is beyond reasonable conception that any contingency can arise which would make its exchangeability with gold a serious menace to be provided against.

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. I can not. I said in the beginning that I preferred not to be interrupted. I am compelled to talk upon a schedule that really does not admit of local accommodations. [Laughter.]

CIRCULATION TO THE PAR OF BONDS.

But passing to the banking and currency sections of the bill, it is to be observed that there is a general consensus of opinion that additional facilities should be afforded the banks to enable them to provide increased accommodations to the people and to give greater elasticity to their issues. This need becomes obvious in view of the fact that many national banks have deposited bonds to the full amount of their capital stock and exhausted their right to issue circulation. Five hundred and thirty-one banks, with a capital stock of $72,217,500, are thus at the limit of their power without the possibility of adding one dollar to their circulation, however urgent the need.

The right to issue circulation to the par of the bonds deposited would be a relief to such banks as well as to others, especially in the South and West in times of stringency, if not at other times. This would open the way to an immediate increase in the bank circulation of some $25,000,000, while the operation of the provision relieving the banks from the tax on circulation would enable them profitably to increase their issue still more. These provisions operating together would give a certain degree of elasticity to the bank currency by diminishing the cost to the banks of their present issues and providing them with an additional issue of 10 per cent without cost.

If it is true that under existing law banks receive one-half of 1 per cent on their circulation more than they would on an investment of an equivalent amount of capital at 6 per cent, it is obvious that if they were relieved of the 1 per cent tax they would receive 1½ per cent more than on a 6 per cent investment. Then, if to that they add an additional issue of 10 per cent without cost, which, loaned at 6 per cent, would yield the equivalent of two-thirds of 1 per cent on the 90 per cent already out, the aggregate would be 1½ plus two-thirds of 1 per cent or 2½ per cent, making the total return on capital 8½ per cent. At that profit banks would put out all the circulation the people need. With this encouragement they might, if necessary, convert a portion of the miscellaneous securities they carry, amounting last year to some $240,000,000, on which they can not realize more than 4 or 5 per cent, into Government bonds to increase their circulation.

With this relief afforded it is manifest that they would be able if they chose to avail themselves of their privileges to supply all the bank currency required.

ELASTIC BOND-SECURED CURRENCY.

But the inquiry remains whether there is not a better way to provide an elastic currency, adapted to relief in times of stringency and panic, than to give the banks the additional 10 per cent of currency in a lump without cost.

It is not desirable to make currency too plenty or credit too easy in normal times. When money is unduly abundant, bankers strive to increase their loans, causing interest to fall and the price of securities to rise. This causes speculative buying, and the buyers become the bank's borrowing customers on call on the security of stocks. The movement is sometimes short-lived and the crisis speedily reached. The longer it lasts the more disastrous the collapse. In all cases, sooner or later, a cessation of the rise in prices must come and then panic.

A little check on the elasticity of currency while the rise in stocks is in rapid progress would have a wholesome effect. A little tightness of the money market, causing interest to rise gradually, not abruptly, leading to a slight shrinkage in prices, might prevent a panic or at least mitigate its intensity. Some one has compared it to letting off steam from a boiler through an escape pipe instead of bottling it up until the boiler explodes. But some give in the currency is needed at times and ought to be available, but it ought not to be unrestricted. Business and prosperity keep money in active circulation because more people are employed and their business is done almost exclusively with cash. Then, again, wages are advancing and prices are rising—conditions which require more currency. Furthermore, the country, the West and South especially, does not supply so many deposits to the reserve centers.

Western banks have recently offered 2½ per cent for deposits. The new rule of the clearing-house banks making a charge for the collection of out-of-town checks has diverted large amounts of money to other cities. For this and other reasons, perhaps, there is at times a legitimate need for some increase in the currency. To meet this need banks have recourse now to means of which they do not avail themselves. The national banks of the United States could issue in the aggregate $345,000,000 more circulation than they do. New York has not exhausted its limit by $29,000,000, nor Chicago by $16,000,000, nor the West by $18,000,000. It may be that there would be no profit in issuing that amount. If there was it would doubtless be issued, for men do not go into the banking business exclusively for their health or amusement. The likelier reason is that they do not need it in view of the enormous deposits they have.

On September 7 the national banks of New York City had individual deposits amounting to over $450,000,000, besides carrying the money of other banks all over the country to the amount of nearly $253,000,000. These amounts are fabulous and the uninitiated can hardly understand how it can all be disposed of; but on the date named the loans and discounts of these banks amounted to about $542,000,000. Little wonder they had at that time an outstanding circulation of but $15,000,000, while their total investment in permanent securities was over $104,000,000. So that whatever indulgence we extend to national banks, it will be availed of to a limited extent only in central reserve cities; but the country outside the great cities needs this relief and ought to have it.

But with the tax on circulation removed I think a profitable increase of the issues would take place sufficient to meet the requirements of business under normal conditions. The Comptroller suggests that the banks will immediately take out the additional circulation for the purpose of profit; that business credits will be extended and adjusted to correspond with such increase of the currency, and practically the same inelasticity will characterize our bank-note issues then as now. With the advent of a panic we would have no additional means of lessening the necessity for a curtailment of loans. In view of this he strongly recommends that the additional issues of 10 per cent be subjected to a tax of 2 or 3 per cent while in circulation, which will tend to prevent its unrestricted use under normal conditions and to save it for use at those periods of the year when the moving of the crops or the existence of panic most urgently calls for additional currency to assist the general liquidation of debts.

If the Comptroller's assumption is warranted, that an increase of $100,000,000 of bank notes may be reasonably expected as the result of the proposed modification in the mode of taxation of national bank notes—and I think there is strong reason for the assumption—then it is obvious enough that the true method of supplying an elastic, bond-secured emergency circulation is to subject the additional 10 per cent issue to such a tax as would restrict its use to such emergencies as demand it in the interest of the banks and the public need. As this provision is not in the bill, I do not care to elaborate the subject at this time, and I advert to it only to bring it to the attention of the House for their consideration.

The provision in the bill authorizing the institution of banks in small towns with a capital of $25,000 meets a long-experienced need in many sections of the Union, notably in the South and West. The call for smaller banks from these sections has been incessant for years.

BRANCH BANKS.

It is the only relief practicable for small communities. Branch banks advocated by some are out of the question in this country. They are incompatible with our system and, if permitted, would overthrow it. The large, strong banks of the cities, with their branches, would eat up the small independent banks of the country, and then by their competition would continue the struggle between each other until the strongest only survived. Where branch banking prevails it is held that the fewer and the stronger the banks the greater the safety. The main cause of the recent bank troubles in Montreal was that some of the weaker banks found the competition too severe for them. A learned writer says:

Under the branch banking system all the weaker institutions are compelled eventually to succumb, and there remain only such a number of strong banks as, with their branches, can find a reasonable profit within the field occupied.

These independent banks under our popular free banking system have been conspicuous factors in building up the localities in which they are established. A bank owned and managed by the people of the locality where it does business has a more direct interest in the advancement of that locality than the branch of a large city bank could have. Under our system of local independent banks this country has enjoyed a development, growth, progress, and prosperity unrivaled by any country having a system of monopolistic banks. I am sure the man is out of tune with the sentiment of the people of this country who advocates such a modification of our system as would turn over the banking business of this country to a limited number of large city banks.

SMALL BANKS.

Smaller banks, then, being the only feasible relief for the rural communities, they should be authorized.

In the report of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Fifty-fifth Congress on a bill containing this provision it is said:

Under the existing law the minimum capital stock required for the organization of a national bank is $50,000. In some sections of the country there has been a growing need for bank issues, as well as for other banking accommodations, in small towns in which the amount of $50,000 can not readily be raised for banking purposes. The inequality in the distribution of national banks is one of the marked features of our national banking system. In the Eastern and Middle States banks are abundant, and this alteration in the law would not be availed of to any considerable extent. But in the Western and Southern States there is a dearth of banks in many sections, due, no doubt, to the lack of capital in those sections.

The following statement illustrates the situation:

Statement of banks, bank stock, and bank circulation in the States named.

States.	Number of banks.	Bank stock.	Bank circulation.
Massachusetts	268	$97,017,500	$31,511,708
Pennsylvania	412	74,230,129	27,049,870
New York	334	87,136,090	35,625,522
Ohio	248	45,645,338	15,714,886
Illinois	220	38,696,000	7,322,015
Indiana	114	14,372,000	5,521,090
New Jersey	102	14,385,000	4,966,527
Iowa	168	13,510,000	3,865,309
North Carolina	27	2,716,000	830,067
South Carolina	16	1,918,000	540,473
Georgia	20	3,666,000	1,143,504
Florida	18	1,485,000	368,668
Alabama	26	3,585,000	1,206,823
Mississippi	18	755,000	249,532
Louisiana	21	3,735,000	1,349,892
Arkansas	9	1,220,000	279,916

It thus appears that a marked discrepancy exists in the bank circulation and accommodations in the different sections of the country. This inequality may be remedied, in part, at least, and the existing need met to some extent in the sections where there is a dearth of bank issues and banks are so remote from each other as to afford grossly inadequate accommodations. Relief of this character has been recommended by those best qualified to judge, and meets the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, who is most familiar with the banking needs of the country.

In the report of the Comptroller of the Currency two years ago it is said:

The minimum capital stock required at present for the organization of a national bank is $50,000, with a deposit with the Treasurer of the United States of United States bonds of $12,500. The proposed reduction of capital stock to $25,000, with a proportionate reduction in the amount of bonds to be deposited with the Treasurer, in places of less than 2,000 inhabitants, would give independent banks of issue to communities in the South and West which, owing to the conditions surrounding them, can not take from their daily business needs a greater sum and invest in banking. The result is that they are deprived both of the use of foreign and local capital and the utilizing of their own credits. The safety of banking upon a reduced capital stock in such localities would be not less than that which attaches at present in larger cities and towns upon a greater capital stock. State banks are, under proper regulations and safeguards, conducted upon the basis of a small capital and, with the methods of examinations employed and the requirements exacted, there is no reason to believe that banks in the national system would be less safe. It would be far better for depositors in all towns and villages of limited population if officers and directors of national banks had dividends to pay upon but half of fifty thousand of capital instead of upon the whole amount. It would lessen the hazarding of loans upon uncertainties in order to make a profit which can not be legitimately earned, and therefore diminish the number of resultant failures.

SOME STRIKING COMPARISONS.

This argument is convincing enough, but it may be reenforced by some further considerations highly important to any adequate treatment of the banking question. That we may have before our minds conditions with which we are compelled to reckon in devising means of relief for sections suffering from lack of banking facilities, I reproduce the results in brief of an investigation I made some two years ago of the conditions existing in different sections of the Union, which, I believe, create an insuperable difficulty in the way of making any uniform system of banking equally efficacious in all parts of the Union. These conditions embrace area, population, personal and real property, farm lands, farm products, mortgages, average rate of interest, manufactured products, wages of employees in manufacturing, silver product, savings-bank depositors, number of national banks, capital stock, bonds to secure circulation, bank-note circulation, individual deposits, loans and discounts, money due by national banks, State banks, and reserve agents, and stocks and securities held by the national banks in each State.

For the purpose of the comparison I have adopted a classification of States as McKinley States and Bryan States, embracing, of course, in the former class all that gave their vote in the election of 1896 for McKinley and in the latter all that voted for Mr. Bryan. This mode of classification is adopted for convenience only and not for the purpose of appealing to political feeling, for on the money question there can be no politics. There is, however, a coincidence worthy of notice, that the States which voted for Bryan are those in which the greatest need for additional banking facilities is supposed to exist. This fact suggested the mode of classification adopted.

For the sake of brevity I will omit the tabulated statements, but will give the results of the comparison, which you will find interesting and instructive.

It shows that the McKinley States have in round numbers 35 and the Bryan States 65 per cent of the total area, while in population the ratio is substantially reversed, the McKinley States having 64 and the Bryan States 36 per cent of the total.

In school expenditures the McKinley States rise to 78 and the Bryan States fall to 22 per cent of the total. In the former the per capita expenditure for education is $2.71 and in the latter $1.37.

Of personal property the McKinley States possess 68 and the Bryan States 32 per cent of the total. Of real property the former hold 76 and the latter 24 per cent of the total. Of farm lands the McKinley States have 71 and the Bryan States 29 per cent of the total in value.

Of farm products the McKinley States produce 60 and the Bryan States 40 per cent of the total product. Of real-estate mortgages the McKinley States are burdened with 81 and the Bryan States with 19 per cent of the total incumbrance. Of manufactured products the McKinley States produce 87 and the Bryan States 13 per cent of the total product. Of the wages paid labor in manufacturing the McKinley States pay 88 and the Bryan States 12 per cent of the total wage paid. In silver product the Bryan States are far in the lead, producing 98 and the McKinley States but 2 per cent of the total product. In number of savings-bank depositors the McKinley States show over 98 and the Bryan States less than 2 per cent of the whole number, reversing the ratio in the case of silver.

It must be admitted that these are most pregnant facts and are of the profoundest significance in the consideration of the banking and currency question and its bearing upon those sections of the Union which exhibit such marked inferiority in all the elements which constitute the basis of modern economy in the mechanism of commercial exchange.

It is not my purpose at this time to submit any reasoning from the conditions I have brought into view. Every member of this House will be sensible enough of the influence they must exert upon the problem of supplying currency and credit to communities so deficient in the very breath of life to fiscal institutions. It is not to be expected that communities comparatively weak in the material resources which must precede banking facilities can maintain a banking system suitable to stronger, more developed, wealthy, and populous sections any more than we can expect the feebleness of childhood or the decrepitude of age to admit of the regimen suitable to the vigor of mature manhood. Banks can not be maintained where there is no banking to do; credit money is unavailable where credit does not exist; but these will grow up in every community just as fast as material development, capital, wealth, and business require them.

The comparisons I have given, as you have observed, relate to those conditions which constitute the foundations of a prosperous community. I now give you the results of a comparison in another class of conditions relating to the banking situation in the several sections of the Union. From this you will perceive how the latter conditions correspond with the former, showing from the comparison of facts the exact situation we would expect from an a priori view.

This exhibit shows that the McKinley States contain 75 and the Bryan States but 25 per cent of the total number of national banks. Of the capital stock the McKinley States have 83 and the Bryan States 17 per cent of the total. Of bonds deposited to secure circulation the McKinley States have 89 and the Bryan States 11 per cent of the total. Of bank-note circulation the McKinley States have 88 and the Bryan States 12 per cent of the total. Of individual deposits the McKinley States have 85 and the Bryan States 15 per cent of the total. Of loans and discounts the McKinley States have 91 and the Bryan States 9 per cent of the total. Of the money due from national and State banks and from reserve agents the McKinley States have between 80 and 85 and the Bryan States an average of about 20 per cent of the total. Of the stocks and securities held by the banks the McKinley States have 87 and the Bryan States 13 per cent of the total.

But a glance at these percentages will show how completely they conform to those in the former comparison, demonstrating that banks will exist where they are most needed and will multiply in proportion to the means of creating them and the need for their use.

LANCASTER COUNTY.

Now, let me, in the way of an object lesson, submit an illustration of the disparity of banking benefits enjoyed in different sections on account of differences in the conditions under which banking operations are carried on.

Lancaster County, Pa., which constitutes the Tenth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, contains an area of less than 1,000 square miles and has a population of about 150,000. It is an agricultural county, containing 500,000 acres of cultivated land divided into 9,000 farms which are assessed at nearly $90,000,000. Its agricultural product in 1890 was $7,657,790, exceeding by at least 25 per cent that of any other county in the Union. Its people have $21,500,000 invested in judgments and mortgages. It has 26 national banks, with a capital stock of $3,650,000 and a note circulation of $1,087,430. No citizen in the county need travel from his residence more than 12 miles at most to a national bank, where he can obtain all the accommodations he needs if he possesses the necessary collaterals.

The following table exhibits the banking situation in that county on October 6, 1896, and the situation has not materially changed since that time:

Bank statement for Lancaster County, Pa.

Number of banks.	Capital stock.	Bonds to secure circulation.	Notes in circulation.	Individual deposits.	Loans and discounts.
26.....	$3,650,000	$1,344,500	$1,203,920	$5,568,060.00	$7,085,301.73

I now present, in order to bring the contrast fully into view, a corresponding statement of the banking situation in the seven Southern States named.

Banking statement for seven Southern States named.

Florida	17	1,350,000	405,000	362,930	3,911,651	3,567,624
Alabama	27	3,405,000	1,215,500	1,063,600	5,727,797	6,417,525

Arkansas.....	9	1,220,000	248,500	208,190	1,601,422	2,365,437
Average.....	19	2,208,571	500,628	596,171	4,083,176	5,084,224

In the foregoing comparison we see side by side two agricultural sections of our country—one a single county, with an area of 973 square miles, with a population of 150,000 and one Representative in Congress; the other, seven sovereign States, with an average area of 48,985 square miles, an average population of 1,225,524, and an average representation in Congress of seven members. The result of the comparison shows that the former area, limited in extent and population as it is, has 37 per cent more banks, 65 per cent more capital stock, 140 per cent more bonds deposited for circulation, 100 per cent more circulating notes, 36 per cent more individual deposits, and 57 per cent more loans and discounts than the average number and amounts in the States embraced in the latter extended area.

The conditions which account for such disparity in banking facilities as are revealed in the foregoing comparison are conspicuous factors in the problem of national banking. They render impossible of attainment the proposal of some enthusiastic currency reformers, viz, a banking system which will furnish equal facilities to and make credit equally available in all portions of the country and distribute the loanable capital of the country so as to meet the needs of all sections. This might be possible in a country of more homogeneous conditions than ours, but here and now it is one of the "iridescent dreams" of financial Utopia, for dissimilar conditions will never yield similar or equal results in banking any more than in other realms. The best we can do will be an approximation to this ideal; to so amend our system as to secure the least of the worst and the most of the best results of a uniform national banking system. The bill before the House is an important step in that direction, and its passage will afford no inconsiderable relief in the sections of the country where the need is greatest.

FINANCIAL EMPIRE COMING TO AMERICA.

In a large sense the benefits of this measure will not be sectional, but coextensive with the Union, for it is a distinct legislative declaration of that purpose which the people of the United States steadfastly insist upon, that they shall be on a sound financial basis. Its provisions promote the maintenance of the five points of currency "Calvanism"—uniformity, safety, convertibility, elasticity, and sufficiency. These tenets constitute the standard of our faith and practice, and give assurance to the world that in banking and currency, at least, the United States is orthodox. Of this our history has given abundant demonstration.

This country has had a singularly interesting financial experience. Without summoning the ghost of our continental currency, we have seen hundreds of millions of dollars, the circulation of a portion of our country, engaged in an unfortunate attempt to break up our family housekeeping, like the apples of Sodom turn to ashes in the hands of the people, sweeping away great blocks of the wealth of its holders.

We have seen other millions of bank notes issued by State institutions depreciate in value, lose their currency, and become worthless in the hands of their unhappy holders. On the other hand, we have witnessed a currency exchanged for the wealth of the country to carry on a war for the preservation of the Union appreciate from 36 cents on the dollar to par in gold. From the ragged edge of worthlessness it rose in a few fleeting years to the value of specie the world over, commanding its face in gold in every commercial city on the globe. This achievement of unrivaled splendor in finance was due to wise legislation and invincible integrity.

One of the first steps we took after the war in our splendid march to the imperial place we now hold among the nations was to make our paper currency the equivalent of the world's money and equally good everywhere the flag floated. By our steadfast adhesion to the principle of national currency we have maintained our national honor and kept our money sound. Indeed, the wisdom of American statesmanship has evolved out of weakness a stupendous marvel of strength. The financial solidity of the United States will soon be the eighth wonder of the world. Our financial independence is practically achieved. Great and surprising things have come to pass in the last twenty months. We paid a debt of $20,000,000 to Spain without a wrinkle on the placid face of our finances and without shipping a dollar of gold.

The raising of the Bank of England's rate of discount produces no impression here. Even Congress convenes without exciting apprehension of financial disturbance. Financial empire is coming our way. We are advancing with leaps and bounds to the position of a creditor nation. Power and dominion in the financial world follow the course of commerce and manufactures. The scepter is passing from the Old to the New World, and New York will supplant London in the near future. American credits in Europe are putting a different face on the great questions of finance the world over. We are loaning money abroad by the millions, and we are very near the point where we can hold the reins of financial power on two continents.

Mr. Chairman, I hail the alluring prospect. I indulge the hope that the representatives of the American people will rise to the level of the new occasion which teaches new duties. This measure is a part of the forward movement which leads upward through the gateway of our great opportunity. The gates of the East and South are open, and the immeasurable possibilities of world commerce invite us. A merchant marine commensurate with our resources, power, and empire will soon be among our achievements. A naval armament worthy a nation capable of achievements of such unrivaled splendor on the sea as shed undying luster on our naval heroes in the late war will soon be among our possessions. This Republic is rising into prominence as a coequal with the great world powers and will be a conspicuous factor in the world problems which loom in the twilight future.

This measure will be an effective agency in our equipment for the opportunities which Providence has laid at our feet. It is a necessary part of our qualification for the preeminence we are achieving in the commercial and financial world. A world power must have its finances based upon a world standard and must keep its money the best the world knows.

Among the inscriptions on the monument which perpetuates the memory, records the achievements, and recites the glories of England's Virgin Queen there is not one that shines with so fadeless a luster as that which tells how she restored the money of the Kingdom.

It is a happiness to know that among the recitals on the pages of American history that shall record the achievements and transmit to endless generations the imperishable glory of this Republic there will be none that will shine down the centuries with a more supernal splendor than that which tells how this nation preserved its honor, maintained its credit, and kept its money good. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

[Extracts from the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899.]

Section 333 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that the Comptroller of the Currency, in his annual report to Congress, shall suggest amendments to the banking laws by which the system may be improved.

There is one reform needed in the bank-note currency of the United States concerning the general principles of which there seems little room for honest controversy. This is a provision for an emergency circulation which can be used in those seasons of the year in which the moving of crops requires an increase in the circulating medium, and to lessen the disastrous effects of the immense liquidation of credits incident to a financial panic. The widespread ruin and misery, affecting all classes of citizens and all kinds of business, which results from an industrial and financial panic is such that any measure designed to forestall or to lessen its destructive power should properly demand the highest degree of consideration. A time of active commerce and normal financial conditions, such as we are enjoying at present, is most opportune for the deliberate and careful discussion of measures which, if adopted now, may in a measure relieve the embarrassments above indicated and the keenness of the distress of commercial and industrial interests incident to such panics as those of 1873 and 1893.

It is true that the enactment of legislation by which the credit of our governmental currency may be protected from the effects of deficient revenues and from the influences of commercial panic is important as a measure of governmental policy at this time. The panic of 1893 and an ensuing period of deficiency in governmental revenue demonstrated that fact; but they likewise demonstrated the necessity of circulation of some nature by the banks which could be used to supply the demands during such an extreme emergency for a liquidating medium whose existence would tend to protect solvent institutions of all kinds from forced bankruptcy resulting from a money panic. The object of such a circulation is neither to provide profits to the banks nor to serve as a basis for the expansion of commercial credits under normal conditions. It would be to the country at large what the clearing-house certificates have proved to be in times of panic in some of our larger cities.

The necessity for such circulation, designed for the mutual protection of banks and the public in times of panic and money stringency, and so heavily taxed as to compel its retirement after the period of acute demand for money is passed, is made clearer by a reference to conditions prevailing in 1893.

The deposits of the national banks of the country between May 4 and October 4, 1893, were reduced in the sum of $378,767,691; the contraction in balances on deposit with other banks was $51,138,856; the contraction in stocks and securities was $2,177,912. The banks took out $51,263,616 of new circulation and borrowed $34,615,992 in their efforts to meet the general demands upon them. As a matter of fact, the necessary delay incident to printing national bank notes by the Government after receiving the order for circulation by the banks, amounting on the average to twenty-five days, prevented the issuance of a larger circulation at this time, the acute crisis having passed by the time the notes were ready for delivery, and the order for the notes canceled by the banks in consequence.

The amount of orders canceled for this cause during the period above named is estimated at $11,000,000. Even with the aid of this additional circulation and borrowing, the national banks of the country, to meet this drain in deposits, were compelled to contract their loans during this period in the sum of $118,767,691, taking this immense amount from the productive industries of the country and carrying disaster, not only to employer and employee, but to every class of our citizens.

The records of this office show that with our banking system as a whole the money stringency incident to a financial panic is soon over. At most it is a matter of but a few months. The crisis of a panic once passed, the arrested wheels of general business start moving very slowly, and the unproductive and unloaned capital of the country stagnates in the banks.

In May, 1893, during the panic, the average reserve of the banks of the United States was 21.4 per cent, and in December, 1893, 35.7 per cent. In May, 1898, the banks of New York City held reserves of only 28.5 per cent, and in December, 1893, they held 41.2 per cent, or $90,953,000 above the required legal reserve of 25 per cent.

These facts prove that emergency circulation which could be used to lessen the disastrous effects of the liquidation incident to an industrial and bank panic would be needed for but a few months, and would not remain as a disturbing and unusual factor in business longer than its time of maximum influence.

In connection with the recommendations which he embodies hereafter, the Comptroller repeats the recommendation made by him in his last report to Congress, to wit:

"For the purpose of allowing elasticity to bank-note issues to protect the banks and the community in times of panic, a small amount of uncovered notes, in addition to the secured notes, should be authorized by law, under the following limitations: They should be subjected to so heavy a tax that they could not be issued in normal times for the purpose of profit, but would be available in times of emergency. The tax should be so large upon the solvent issuing banks as to provide a fund which, in connection with the pro rata share of the assets of an insolvent bank, would be sufficient to redeem the notes in full, without necessitating any preference of note holders over depositors of any insolvent issuing bank. The tax should be so large as to force this currency into retirement as soon as the emergency passes. Such a currency could be used only to lessen the evil effects of the too rapid liquidation of credits which are collapsing under a financial panic, but could not be profitably used as a basis of business speculation and inflation. It should be to the business community what the clearing-house certificates are to our cities in times of panic—a remedy for an emergency, not an instrument of current business."

In view of the fact that our national banking system is composed of over 3,600 separate institutions scattered throughout our great country and surrounded by diversified business conditions, the problem of the enactment of such a law, involving as it does a departure to some extent from the principle of a bond-secured circulation, presents grave difficulties, arising partly out of the natural conservatism of our people and from the fact that the plan will be somewhat experimental. That such a law providing for the protection of the business community shall be ultimately passed is of great importance. A marked degree of elasticity, however, is possible of attainment in connection with our present system of bond-secured national bank notes.

The Comptroller believes that, in accordance with the President's recommendation, national banks should be allowed to issue circulation to the par of the United States bonds deposited by them for circulation, and that, in connection with the law authorizing this, provision can be made for a secured emergency circulation.

The object of allowing banks to take out circulation to the par of the bonds is to induce them to furnish for the use of the public a larger amount of circulation than is in existence at present. The present rate of profit to be derived by the banks from their circulation is not sufficient to justify them in offering a larger amount, but any method of increasing the profits on circulation will result in an increase.

It is true that the authorization of an issue of currency to the par of the deposited bonds, subject to the present rate of tax, is one method of inducing a larger circulation, but it is not the only method. By a modification of the present rate of taxation on bank notes, coupled with the authorization of issues to the par of the bonds, the same inducements can be offered for a larger circulation and yet provision be made for a secured emergency circulation.

The Comptroller, therefore, would recommend legislation authorizing the issuance of national bank note circulation to the par of the deposited United States bonds, and that the additional 10 per cent circulation thus allowed the banks be subjected to a tax at the rate of 2 or 3 per cent per annum for the time used, which will tend to prevent its unrestricted use under normal conditions and to save it for use at those periods of the year when crops are to be moved and in those periods of panic when it is most valuable both to the banks and the business public as a means of assisting the general liquidation of credits. With the object of securing an increase in the present bank-note circulation, he would recommend the reduction or abolishment of the present tax of 1 per cent per year on the circulation to 90 per cent of the deposited bonds—the amount of the reduction in the tax on currency to be collected from the necessary per cent of tax on the capital and surplus of national banks if requisite to the public revenues.

To allow the banks to issue up to the par of the bonds, unsubjected to additional tax on the 10 per cent extra circulation, will result in their immediately taking out their additional circulation for the purposes of profit. Business credits will be extended and adjusted to correspond with such increase of the currency, and practically the same inelasticity will characterize our bank-note issues then as now. With the advent of a panic we would have no additional means of lessening the necessity of a call upon the business community to furnish, by the repayment of loans, practically the bulk of the deposits drawn by frightened depositors.

It will be seen from an examination of the calculations given hereinafter that exactly the same rate of profit could be realized by the banks upon circulation to 90 per cent of the bonds deposited, taxed at four-ninths of 1 per cent per annum, as they could realize upon circulation to the par of the bonds at the present tax of 1 per cent.

It will also be seen that if the tax on the 90 per cent of circulation should be entirely abolished, or shifted to the franchise of banks, the profit on circulation would be much larger than could be realized upon circulation issued to the par of the bonds subjected to the present tax.

This rate of profit to be realized upon untaxed circulation issued to 90 per cent of the bonds would be so large that upon circulation issued to the par of the bonds it would be necessary to reduce the tax down to three-fifths of 1 per cent before an equal profit upon par circulation could be made.

It will also be noted that exactly the same rates of profit could be made upon 90 per cent circulation taxed one-sixth of 1 per cent as could be made upon par circulation taxed three-fourths of 1 per cent.

In the judgment of the Comptroller these tables show conclusively that by modification in forms of taxation the same relative increase in general bank-note circulation, with an emergency circulation in addition, can be obtained, while only an increase without any elasticity could be obtained under any system of uniform taxation upon par circulation.

For the purpose of indicating that within the range of the possible modification of taxation on a circulation to 90 per cent of the bonds, provision can be made for an emergency circulation of 10 per cent to the par of the bonds, while amply encouraging the increase in general note circulation desired, the Comptroller summarizes the result of calculations given more in detail hereafter.

Profit in dollars upon circulation issued against a deposit of $100,000, Government 4 per cent bonds maturing in 1907, at present price, being the possible amount to be realized under different rates of taxation, in addition to 6 per cent on the capital invested in bonds, with money worth 6 per cent.

On $90,000 circulation, being 90 per cent of $100,000 bonds, 1 per cent tax on circulation under present laws.....	$279.88
On $100,000 circulation to par of bonds, uniform 1 per cent tax.....	779.88
On $90,000 circulation to 90 per cent of bonds, taxed four-ninths of 1 per cent, making possible an issue of $10,000 emergency circulation, to be taxed at the rate of 2 or 3 per cent for the time issued.....	779.88
On $100,000 circulation to par of bonds, uniform tax of three-fourths of 1 per cent.....	1,029.88
On $90,000 circulation to 90 per cent of par of bonds, taxed one-sixth of 1 per cent, making possible an issue of $10,000 emergency circulation, to be taxed at the rate of 2 or 3 per cent for the time issued.....	1,029.88
On $100,000 circulation to par of bonds, uniform tax of three-fifths of 1 per cent.....	1,179.88
On $90,000 circulation to 90 per cent of par of bonds without taxation, making possible an issue of $10,000 emergency circulation, to be taxed at the rate of 2 or 3 per cent for the time issued.....	1,179.88

In the foregoing figures no profit is calculated as accruing upon the emergency circulation.

The Comptroller believes that the levying of a tax of one-sixth of 1 per cent upon circulation to 90 per cent of the par of the bonds, and allowing the banks to issue currency to the par of the bonds by paying a tax at the rate of 2 or 3 per cent per annum on the excess up to the par when outstanding, will result in the desired increase in our general bank-note issues, and provide a marked degree of elasticity in our circulation.

In this connection the Comptroller can not properly discuss the question of taxation of banks as related to the public revenues further than to say that the imposition of a tax upon the capital and surplus of the banks to offset any reduction in the tax on currency will remove any objection to his recommendation, on the grounds that it lessens the share of the public burden which the banks should properly bear.

In considering the probable effect on the amount of bank circulation outstanding which will result from a change in rates of taxation it must be remembered that the calculation would properly include, if it could be safely made, an estimate of the increased price of Government bonds, which will probably be incident to a greater demand for these bonds from the banks seeking profit on circulation under the modified rate of taxation.

This increased price of bonds may be such as to negative to some degree the desired effect of an increased bank-note circulation, since it will tend to lessen the profits on circulation. It must be remembered, however, that this objection can be made to any method of increasing the apparent profits on bank-note circulation, including the method of authorizing issues to par, subject to a uniform tax.

The Comptroller believes that from the passage of laws altering, as suggested, the rate and method of taxation of national bank notes, an increase of at least $100,000,000 may be reasonably expected.

Based upon our present bond-secured bank-note circulation, which amounts to about $307,000,000, and this added amount, we would have, under such laws, an available bond-secured emergency circulation of at least $50,000,000.

As a summary of his views on this subject, the Comptroller would call attention to the following propositions:

First. Whether or not legislation be passed providing for an uncovered emergency circulation for needed protection from the disastrous effects of panics, a very much larger degree of elasticity can be imparted to our present bond-secured bank-note currency, thus making it of greater use in seasons of the year in which the demand for currency is above the normal, and of invaluable assistance in times of panic.

Second. This result can be obtained by the enactment into law of the President's recommendation that national banks be allowed to issue to the par of the Government bonds deposited by them as security, and by the modification of the present tax upon national banks as follows:

After determining approximately the lowest rate of profit which will call into circulation the additional amount of national bank notes deemed necessary for public convenience, this rate of profit should be reached by lessening or shifting to the franchise of banks the present 1 per cent tax on circulation to 90 per cent of the par of the Government bonds securing it. A tax of 2 or 3 per cent should then be levied on the excess of circulation over 90 per cent of the bonds, which will make of such excess circulation a secured emergency circulation, only to be used when it becomes a public necessity, and not as a means of profit by the banks under normal conditions.

The general increase in bank circulation desired being possible of attainment through the lowering of the tax on the 90 per cent circulation, this additional tax on the 10 per cent excess circulation to the par of the bonds will not materially interfere with such general increase and will only operate to create an emergency circulation of great value.

Third. As the use of rediscounts and bills payable on the part of the Western and Southern banks at certain seasons of the year is regarded as evidencing the need of an elastic circulation, and as bearing upon the question of the measure of relief which may be expected from the bond-secured emergency circulation here recommended, the Comptroller will state that without any general increase in bank-note circulation as a result of new legislation, the possible emergency circulation of $30,000,000 immediately available, based on bonds securing the present circulation, amounts to more than the combined bills payable and rediscounts of all the national banks of the United States outstanding at any time within the last three years.

If the Comptroller's estimate of a possible bond-secured emergency circulation of $30,000,000 be correct, this amount is about double the average combined bills payable and rediscounts of the entire national system outstanding within that period.

As the elastic and uncovered issues of the joint-stock banks of England, Scotland, and Ireland, comprising all the uncovered bank notes there issued, may be cited as illustrating the advantages of an elastic circulation, the Comptroller would also call attention to the fact that these entire issues are but a small amount more than the $30,000,000 bond-secured emergency circulation which would be immediately available on existing bond deposits in the United States under the legislation recommended. And with an increase in general bank-note circulation, resulting from modified laws, we would probably have a bond-secured emergency circulation in this country larger than the emergency circulation of the joint-stock banks of England, Scotland, and Ireland, which is secured only by the general assets of the banks, without preference over other creditors.

Fourth. Even if a special uncovered emergency circulation be provided, to be used only in case of panics, the plan here suggested of changing the taxation and issues of secured bank notes will afford an elastic circulation of value in times of money stringency not approaching the severity of a panic.

With or without the legislation for the special uncovered emergency circulation, the bond-secured emergency circulation will be of great public use.

Fifth. If provision be made for an uncovered emergency circulation for use in times of panic, subject to a tax so large as to be repressive at all other times, the 10 per cent bond-secured emergency circulation herein recommended might be taxed at the rate of 2 per cent per annum for the time issued instead of at the rate of 3 per cent, thus allowing its freer use under more normal conditions. But if no uncovered circulation for panics be provided, the more repressive tax of 3 per cent seems desirable upon the bond-secured emergency circulation.

Sixth. There is no need, under normal conditions, of a large amount of emergency circulation or a high degree of elasticity in bank-note circulation. The immense volume of checks, drafts, and bills of exchange, based upon the assets of banks and often called bank-credit currency, expands and contracts in accordance with the demand of trade and business, and is the medium through which the great bulk of the business of our country is transacted. It is extremely elastic, and varies in amounts at different seasons of the same year. It is generally amply adequate to the business needs of the country, except in times of disturbed confidence and financial panic.

Seventh. The issuance of bank-asset notes under normal conditions and in the present development of our banking system can not be justified by the plea that without them the needed elasticity of bank-note currency can not be obtained. Nothing except the avoidance of panic can at present justify any experiments with bank-asset currency. When authorized for use in times of panic the notes should be so heavily taxed that they can circulate only while a panic lasts and, like clearing-house certificates, should be a remedy simply for a rare emergency.

In seeking the theoretical advantages of fluidity in bank circulation we should take no risks with its solidity.

The following table, to which reference has already been made, shows the calculation in detail of profits on bond-secured national bank-note circulation under the present and different methods of taxation and issue:

Profit on national bank circulation, secured by $100,000 United States 1 per cent bonds of 1907, at $113.125, money being worth 6 per cent: First, with circulation 90 per cent of bonds, tax 1 per cent; second, circulation par of bonds, tax 1 per cent; third, circulation 90 per cent of bonds, tax four-ninths of 1 per cent; fourth, circulation par of bonds, tax three-fourths of 1 per cent; fifth, circulation 90 per cent of bonds, tax one-sixth of 1 per cent; sixth, circulation par of bonds, tax three-fifths of 1 per cent, and seventh, circulation 90 per cent of bonds, with no tax.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, an analysis of this bill discloses its purpose, meaning, and intent to be, (1) unequivocally to fix the gold standard on this country; (2) to make all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, all the greenbacks, Treasury notes, silver certificates, silver dollars, and other forms of currency redeemable and payable in gold coin, and all obligations, public and private, past, present, and future, for the payment of money payable in gold coin; (3) to impound and destroy the $346,000,000 of paper currency commonly known as greenbacks; (4) to make permanent a gold reserve; (5) to give greater power to the national banks over the currency of the United States, and to further delegate to them the power of sovereignty.

I insist that not one of the provisions of the bill should be enacted into law. The mover of this bill, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], has made a painstaking and elaborate argument in its support, and it is to be presumed that he has exhausted all the argument that will or can be made in its behalf. He is reasonably fair, but the fault of his argument mainly is the fallacy of his premises. He assumes that gold and silver have an intrinsic value. This is not true. They have a relative value and are measured by each other, by the lawful functions they may perform, and by the commodities they acquire or interchange for. Without a demand to perform any duties for mankind they would be valueless; and they increase in value in proportion to the service and functions they perform. He also premised by the assertion that the legal-tender quality of money does not add to its value.

He next assumed that money is only a medium of exchange, and, lastly, that the value of silver was, prior to 1873, the equal in value to gold, because but a small quantity of silver had then been coined and in circulation. The controversy here necessarily brings up for consideration, incidentally, if not directly, the coinage question or "silver issues." And the pertinent issue involved is the contention that the Democratic party has always made, that the quantity of money in circulation among the people regulated its value and brought prosperity or distress. I concede that for the past eighteen months the country has increased in prosperity, that the products of labor are bringing a higher price, and that employment of labor has increased. But these results are attributed mainly, if not only, to the increased volume of money put in circulation among the people; that it is not in consequence of the single gold standard as practiced or proposed, but has come in spite of it.

The volume of money has not only been increased in this country, but the quantity put in circulation among the people has been enormously increased. Our exports have exceeded our imports for the past two years to the amount of $1,145,307,489. This money, paid by foreign nations for the products of labor in this country, has been added to our circulating medium. It is believed by many that during the past eighteen months we have sold more American stocks and securities abroad than during any other period of our history. If true, the money arising from these sales has been added to our currency. The gold productions of the world for the past two years have been greater than ever before, and the United States have been the beneficiary of the lion's share of this product.

A great war has been waged, in which the Government has had to expend about $350,000,000, and this vast sum of money directly and immediately delivered to the people, though later it will have to be returned by the people to the Government. In the war now being waged in the Philippine Archipelago we are expending about $600,000 per day. A bond issue has been made by the present Administration and $200,000,000 worth of bonds were sold to the bankers of this country, and the money derived from the sale of these bonds has been distributed among the people for labor and the products of labor.

More than 100,000 men during the past twelve months have been employed by the Government as soldiers, sailors, seamen, etc., and thereby were removed from competition with American labor, and consequently increased the demand for labor.

Mr. Chairman, these are the things that have brought about the apparent prosperity, and these are the results promised by the Democratic party if the volume of money should be increased by the free coinage of silver.

To insist that the legal-tender quality of money does not add to its value is to dispute a law of business as well as a law of nature. I concede that law can not directly confer value on any metal or material, but law can create a demand which will confer value on a money metal or anything else, and this demand will be created by giving to money a legal-tender quality. As a medium of exchange legal-tender money is not absolutely essential; but money is not only a medium of exchange; it is a standard and measure of value, and I will add the further definition that it is the representative of human energy deposited for future use. Then, if you increase the functions that this medium of exchange, measure of value, and representative of labor may perform, you necessarily add to its value. It is true there are a great many matters of detail connected with money or the financial question.

Mr. Chairman, the effects of the various financial policies that have been proposed permeate every nook and corner of business life and leave their impress upon all commercial, manufacturing, mining, and agricultural activity, yet the gist of the matter I believe to be very simple. All business is governed by the same principle; all nature is governed by the same laws. The force that draws down the meteor to disastrous collision with the earth is the same force that causes the leaf to float silently down to the ground. The same laws that govern the interpretation of a contract to build a nation's capitol or to string an electric cable beneath the sea also govern the construction of a contract to deliver a bale of cotton or a bunch of cattle, and so the principles that underlie this question of free coinage of silver and the single gold standard underlie the simplest and commonest transactions of everyday life.

The question here presented is simply a question of money monopoly. All know that there is a law known as the law of demand and supply. According to this law, if there is a great demand for an article, or if the amount demanded is greater than the amount that can be supplied, the price of the article will rise, and if the supply of the article is greater than the demand, the price of the article will fall. If the amount of money which can be used to transact the business of this country is large, much larger than there is a demand for, then money will be cheap. If, on the other hand, the supply of money is not large enough to meet the demand, if two dollars are needed where only one dollar can be found, then money will do just what everything else would do under the same circumstances—it will rise in value and purchasing power.

The law of demand and supply is a natural law, and there are no exceptions to the laws of nature. They are general; they are universal. In all countries, in all ages past, men have attempted at times to get control of the stock or supply of one article or another in order to be able to put up the prices and thus enrich themselves off the necessities of their fellow-men. They are all about us to-day, and we call them trusts. They go hand in hand with the power that is attempting to force this bill as a law upon the American people, and they are both moved by the same purpose, hoping and expecting the same result.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is bad because it is retroactive in its effect, and makes all the obligations of the Government and the private obligations of the citizen payable in one kind of money only—gold. When the public and private debts now existing were contracted and incurred they were payable in the lawful money of the United States, and that money was gold, silver, and paper. By the destruction of the greenbacks, as proposed in this bill, and by making all the silver and paper currency a charge upon gold, leaving gold the only legal-tender money, the money of the country will not only be contracted, thereby adding to the value of the remaining money, but the gold will be additionally increased in value, because it will be authorized by law to perform a function that no other circulating medium or money can perform. This purposed legislation will change the contracts to the injury of the debtor class of this country.

All laws affect all persons some and many persons seriously. The effect of this law would be to materially and seriously affect the weaker class of our people, the debtor class. Should it follow that under this law we would have a redundant currency or an increased volume of money, then it would injuriously affect the creditor class of our people. If favors to one of these classes must be given by law, where in justice and equity ought it to fall? Most men become debtors from necessity. Food and raiment must be obtained for themselves and those dependent upon them, and in order to obtain it they must pledge their future labor to obtain credit. Most men become creditors from choice and for profit. It is the expected interest and profit that buy the use of the money of the creditor. Then, if one must suffer by law it is but equitable and humane that he who is weakest and enforced by the necessities of himself or family to incur obligations should receive the favor of the law.

Mr. Chairman, I predict that if this bill becomes a law it will result in an appreciating currency. Were the operation of an appreciating currency equal upon all men, little damage might be done, but he perishes first who is weakest, and by his ruin drags down the stronger. The farmer is the weakest of capitalists, and therefore has the least power of resistance, because he can not suspend production. In like manner farm labor is weaker than industrial labor, because it can not combine. The farmers of the country per capita may be the smallest debtors, but in the aggregate owe the largest sum of money of any class of its citizens.

This bill purposes to impound and furnishes the means and opportunity to destroy $346,000,000 of the lawful money (greenbacks) of the United States, and yet we have the anomalous statements made by the friends of the bill that its effect will be to increase the volume of money.

Mr. Chairman, the last and possibly the most dangerous provision of the bill is that section which purposes to delegate further sovereignty and greater power to the national banks. I am not opposed to banks when they operate within their proper sphere and do not exercise the functions of government. In fact, I would aid them in all manner of ways that they may facilitate the business transactions of the country. But their history has been one of constant danger to the Republic. Almost since the beginning of our history, between the people and the banks there has been an irrepressible conflict, and this conflict will never be over so long as governments are so constructed and legislation so enacted as to give scope and opportunity for the free operation of the principles of greed, ambition, selfishness, and love of power.

Scarcely had our Government been installed when some men from the Eastern States came to Congress and asked this body to delegate to them the power to issue paper money, and thus control the money supply of the country. This request, so hostile to the spirit of democracy, was the first test of the new system. It was the first deviation from the idea of equality to all and special privileges to none. Had our forefathers withstood this attack boldly much of subsequent American history might never have been written; but they yielded and a charter was granted for twenty years to an institution to be known as the United States Bank. The next great trial of strength between the people and the classes occurred when the first charter of the United States Bank expired by limitation and a second charter was asked for. The friends of the people fought the measure with all the energy they possessed and clearly pointed out its unconstitutionality and its hostility to the fundamental idea of popular government. In vain did Mr. Jefferson say:

Bank paper must be suppressed and the circulation be restored to the nation, to whom it belongs.

In vain did he say:

I have ever been the enemy of banks—not of those discounting for cash, but of those foisting their own paper into circulation and thus banishing our cash.

The bank triumphed by using in its struggle against popular rights the very power which the people had granted to it. When the second charter expired its advocates again came before Congress and demanded a renewal of the charter. Fortunately for Democracy, Andrew Jackson, a man who knew no fear of the harm which corporate influence could do him, fought the measure with all the energy of his intense nature; but it was again in vain.

In vain did Secretary of the Treasury Gallatin say:

The right of issuing paper money as currency, like that of gold and silver coins, belongs exclusively to the nation, and can not be claimed by any individual or association of individuals.

In vain did Secretary of the Treasury Crawford say:

Coinage and the regulation of money have, in all nations, been considered the highest acts of sovereignty. As a paper currency is issued upon the national credit, the whole property of the nation is pledged for its redemption. It is, therefore, manifest that it should not issue upon the credit of any individual or association of individuals.

In vain did the New York State convention say:

We declare unqualified hostility to bank notes and paper money as a circulating medium, because gold and silver is the only constitutional currency.

Just as the national Democratic convention, four years later, declared:

We believe such an institution (a national bank) one of deadly hostility to the best interest of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and to the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power and above the laws and will of the people.

In spite of all these utterances and influences the bank triumphed. Congress passed the charter, but President Jackson vetoed the bill, and the bank expired, and for twenty-five years the country got along without a national bank, and these were among the most prosperous in our commercial history.

Mr. Chairman, when the civil war broke out the spirit of greed and lust for power again asserted itself. When the plain, common people were hurrying to the front to offer their services and their lives to their country, these friends of a national bank hurried to Washington and offered their services, not to fight their country's battle, but to have themselves made the beneficiaries of a system of national banks by virtue of which the banker would have his property exempted from taxation and would have the privilege of drawing interest on his untaxed property and also on his debts. The country was then in the throes of war, and money was urgently needed. Were it not for this I would say, shame on the Congress that would grant such privileges.

The money power has been insidious and sleepless, and has constantly wrenched from the Government, to the injury of the people, an unfair and an unjust power. The holders of the obligations of the Government that were originally payable in the lawful currency of the United States and that could have then been paid with money worth 40 to 50 cents on the dollar in coin came before Congress in 1869 and demanded that the contract be changed and that these obligations be made payable in coin, and they got what they asked for. The excuse for the act was that the law would strengthen the credit of the country. The paper currency of the Government had been good enough to pay off the common soldier and the common sailor and the farmer who had furnished supplies for the aid of the Government, but it was not good enough to pay the banker and the bondholder who had speculated on the necessities of the country. Not satisfied with this advantage, these same people came to Congress again in 1873 and demanded that silver be demonetized, thereby again changing the obligations from coin obligations to gold obligations. Again they got what they asked.

Encouraged by their previous successes, they now come to Congress asking that the word "gold" shall not only be written in the obligations of the Government, but that it shall be written in all the contracts and obligations of the people. Cheered by the power that has heretofore been granted them, they come demanding that the Government shall parcel out its sovereignty and surrender to them the manipulation and control of the fiscal and financial affairs of the Government. And it is evident that this branch of Congress "will crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" and yield to this hurtful and unreasonable demand.

Mr. Chairman, true Democracy is sympathy for the poor and unfortunate. It rejoices with those who rejoice in the success of honest effort and weeps with those who feel the pitiless hand of misfortune and oppression. True Democracy is to-day looking with sympathetic glances toward the courageous Boers, who are struggling for liberty and self-government. Wherever on this earth are the poor, the unfortunate, the oppressed; wherever is heard the hiss of the oppressor's lash; wherever is seen the triumph of selfish greed over human right; wherever is found a brave, honest, frugal, self-denying, toiling people, striving to obtain a just reward for their labor and avail themselves of the protection which a just government ought to confer on its citizens, there the spirit of Democracy broods over them with loving tenderness. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I shall not, of course, undertake to make a speech upon the theories underlying what I believe to be the sound financial principle of bimetalism.

I have made that speech not once already, but three times in this House, considering every possible phase of it as far as I was intellectually able to consider it. I rise here to-day for the purpose of noticing a few things which have arisen in this debate.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. McCLEARY], who was heard yesterday, notices "a strange inconsistency" upon the part of gentlemen upon this side. He says that they do not come "rushing down the aisles now holding free-silver bills in their hands to offer as substitutes." The remark, in its quibbling and in its lack of intellectual integrity, was worthy of all other arguments which the gentleman used during the same debate. When giving some facts of history, with other and explanatory facts of the same history lying embedded in his own mind, he tried to create a false impression. This he attempted to do by using the words "silver dollar" in a double sense—using it himself to mean the specific coin, but expecting the people who heard him to understand it to mean silver money. You will all recall that.

Now, why do I say that the gentleman has quibbled when he says we do not come down the aisles with free-silver bills in our hands as substitutes? I say it because he knows as well as I know that this rule has been constructed for the express purpose of preventing amendments, substitutes, or anything else upon which record votes can be obtained in the House of Representatives.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. McCLEARY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Would you, if you could, introduce a free-silver amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, answering for myself, I stand here to say that I have never yet made a public utterance by which I would not abide, because that utterance has always been not only the conviction of my constituents, but my own. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And had I the power now, standing here as I do, if I were the Czar of America and had unlimited power, I would to-morrow open the mints to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, with but one doubt in my mind, and that doubt would be as to whether it were not better to go to the world's legislative ratio of 15½ to 1. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCLEARY. I am glad to have the gentleman express himself. Will he pardon me other question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I, Mr. Chairman, at any rate, am not one of those who profess opinions that they would not dare carry into execution.

Mr. McCLEARY. May I ask another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield always.

Mr. McCLEARY. In view of the statement of my friend a moment ago as to quibbling, I desire to ask his attention to the fact that we have always had the coinage of subsidiary silver. The act of 1873 did not prevent that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman's question, and I want to save as much time as possible.

Mr. McCLEARY. Pardon me just for a moment. I will see that you get more time. The only thing men have ever talked about in regard to the act of 1873 was the silver dollar piece. The crime of 1873 was that that specific coin was cut off. My point was to show that that specific coin had never been coined as money.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I can not yield further, because my time is so short and I understand the gentleman's question. I say that the gentleman is quibbling again. When the act of 1873 was passed the only legal-tender full-rate silver money was the silver dollar, and therefore we complain that when they then struck down the silver dollar they struck down all silver as standard, self-redeeming money.

But prior to 1873, and prior to 1834, when the mints of the country were opened to the unlimited coinage of silver in halves and in quarters that were full weight, containing exactly one-half or one-fourth of the amount of silver in a silver dollar, and being full legal tender, the gentleman knows that the complaint would not have been then that the "silver dollar" was stricken down, but would have been that "silver" was stricken down; nor would it have been solely that in 1873, when the silver dollar was struck down, had there then been in existence halves and quarters that were of full weight, full legal-tender, self-redeeming money; and the gentleman was possessed of all these facts in his mind. I know of my own knowledge that there is not a man in this House better acquainted with the facts of American financial history than the gentleman from Minnesota.

Now, the gentleman knows as well as I know that when we complain that in 1873 the cessation of the coinage of the silver dollar struck down silver it was because at that time, although it had not been the case at prior times, the silver dollar was the only self-redeeming silver coin.

Mr. McCLEARY. If the gentleman will pardon me—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has taken advantage of that fact, and of the fact that all this argument had preceded along that line, to go back to Jefferson's order in order to make the impression on the minds of the people that Jefferson had stricken down silver when he ordered the cessation of the coinage of the specific coin, one dollar. He does this because in 1873 the silver dollar was regarded by the public as the only form of silver money—that is, standard silver money.

Mr. McCLEARY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will ask him one more question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will yield to the gentleman; and right here I will not only yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, but to any other gentleman upon that side who has a single proposition to make, which, drawn from the present conditions, makes in his opinion the argument which we made in 1896 either discredited, impeached, or false.

Mr. McCLEARY. The gentleman admits, as I understand, that the coin known as the silver dollar has not been coined as money on private account in this century. That was my allegation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I never disputed the letter of that assertion. My entire statement was that you made a misleading allegation based on that. Based upon one sense in which you used the word, literally, perhaps your statement was true, but in doing it you used the words "silver dollar" in such a manner as that the country might understand something which was not true and which you knew was not true.

Mr. McCLEARY. The gentleman had no such purpose. It was absolutely his intention to state exactly what he meant and mean exactly what he said.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let us see. I will leave that to the House. We were engaged in discussing the question of bimetalism, in discussing that; and when the gentleman introduced that argument he must have introduced it as a relevancy, and if it was relevant at all it was relevant upon the ground that it proved that history established the fact that bimetalism did not exist from the time of Jefferson's order and that monometallism did. And if it was not intended by him to be accepted as relevant for that purpose, then I have too much respect for the gentleman's intelligence to believe that he would have used it in the argument at all.

Mr. McCLEARY. Now, one further question, and I will try not to embarrass my friend again or take up his time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not embarrass me, but he does take up my time.

Mr. McCLEARY. Is it or is it not true that the silver coins less than a dollar disappeared from the country for the same reason that the dollar disappeared about 1853?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not at all. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman has come to that, because there is one of the things that I want to explode, if I can explode anything.

Mr. McCLEARY. I would like to hear you explode it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman's whole question is based upon the assumption that there exists a so-called commercial ratio between two metals, and that when we undertook to tie them together, in the early part of our Government, by a ratio of 15½ to 1, gold fled the country, and when we undertook to tie them together, later on in the history of the country, by a ratio of 16 to 1, silver fled the country. Now, that is the basis of presumption in your question, is it not?

Mr. McCLEARY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is the presumption, and they say that it is thereby demonstrated to be a fact that you can not tie the two metals together by a legislative ratio, and that you must attempt to find the commercial ratio. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, a man who has thought the matter out to a result, if he possesses the capacity of a 14-year-old boy, would never afterwards, as long as he lived, make an assertion that there ever had been a commercial ratio between the two metals.

Now, why? Because, unless he uses the phrase "commercial ratio" in a double sense, he means a ratio independent of the use of the metals as money. If he means anything he means that. If he means nothing, why, then, of course, he ought to quit talking. Now, then, how will you find out what the commercial ratio was, or is, or can be, unless one of two things happen—unless both metals were equally and everywhere all over the world not money, or unless both of them were equally and everywhere all over the world money. Neither state of affairs has ever existed in the world. Possibly neither ever will exist.

Now, then, the nearest you can come to what would be a commercial ratio, neither of these state of affairs existing, is to take the ratio of production. Take the ratio of production. We had a ratio of 15½ to 1 prior to the change in 1834 and one of 16 to 1 after that time. And yet the ratio of production between the two metals varied vastly over 100 per cent from 1830, prior to the law, down to 1852, after the law.

By the way, it is not the commercial ratio that made the gold leave us prior to 1834. It was not the commercial ratio that made the silver leave us subsequent to 1834. It was a conflict of legislative ratios, and the mistake that was made by that great man, Hamilton, was that he was foolish enough to attempt to seek an imaginary thing, an ignis fatuus, something that did not exist, never did exist, and can not exist until the conditions are legislated into being. Had he pursued what would seem now to be an obvious, plain, and palpable course, he would have looked abroad, not for a practically not existent, an imaginary and unascertainable thing, but to find what the chief controlling, existing legislative ratio was, and he would have found it to be 15½ to 1. What did he do?

Mr. McCLEARY. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Wait until I get through with this thought and I will answer all questions. I believe I could stand here twenty-four hours, if physical strength would hold out, and answer these questions. What was the consequence, Mr. Chairman? We found the French mints offering a higher price for gold at one period and for silver at a later period, their ratio remaining constant at 15½ to 1 and not varying one-half on either side. Gentlemen say the coins parted company.

They did no such thing. There never was a time except when there were temporary agios (as there was a temporary agio in 1893, when a premium was paid in New York for silver dollars). With the exception of the temporary agios there never was, I say, a time when one American coined dollar was not the exact equivalent in interchangeability and exchangeability with every American coined dollar. The metals parted company. The bullions were not maintained at a parity.

It was not after we coined them that a difference or "parting" came. But because the French mint paid more for gold at one period the gold went there. Later on, when we adopted 16 to 1, the French mint paid 3 cents per ounce more for silver, and silver went there. The very fact that you people have been going all over the country and repeating, viz, that only a certain number of silver dollars were coined prior to the war, proves that the silver did not go to the mint.

In other words, the fact you quote is the proof that your contention as to disparity of coins or moneys is false. In other words, the thing you quote does not prove that you can not tie the two metals together by legislative ratios. It merely proves that as between two conflicting legislative ratios the stronger will prevail. Remember at that time France overtopped us in her influence on the commerce and exchanges of the world, as much as we do her to-day—aye, more. Our legislative ratio met a stronger legislative ratio and went down.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that I was willing to stand here all day and answer any questions or objections the object of which was to show any imagined discrepancy between lessons drawn from actual conditions and the propositions laid down by us in the campaign of 1896, the object of which was to contradict or impeach the theory which we then advanced or to show that that theory is not applicable to present conditions.

Conditions change, and the effect of the application of true theories to them varies in intensity of manifestation, but the principle never varies in itself and is always applicable. I was much struck by an observation made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] in a speech made by him, not because there was anything new in the remark, but because it is eminently applicable to present times. That remark was that "no right conduct, public or private, can be predicated upon anything except a true theory." He was eminently correct. All scientific results begin with a working hypothesis and end in accord with some fundamental law. I care not whether you call it a theory, a law, or a fixed principle.

In politics it is perhaps better to call it a principle. Without fundamental principles a man in his private conduct, a nation in its public conduct, is a derelict at sea, and all those who would physic the body politic without squaring themselves with the fundamental and underlying principle of political science are, after all, but empirics. It has been said in this debate that our nominee for the Presidency in 1896, W. J. Bryan, said, "You might just as well expect to see the law of gravitation violated and an apple fall upward instead of downward as to see prosperity under a gold standard," and it has been argued that the fact that we now have a measure of comparative prosperity not only falsifies his prediction but the theory upon which it was founded.

Mr. Chairman, men in the heat of debate frequently express themselves inadequately. Mr. Bryan is of course no exception to the rule. Men are seeking strong expressions. The excitement of the moment urges them to it, and they have not time to condition every proposition in all of its bearings and in view of all possible contingencies. The gentlemen who have made this objection to what Mr. Bryan said, though they may have literally quoted his words in some extemporaneous speech, know that they are not giving a fair presentation of what he meant nor of the theory which he represents.

What Mr. Bryan meant and what he said, not once, but a hundred times, must be taken as having reference to the then condition of gold production, and if he had had time to condition the remark he would of course have said that with the amount now coming from the mines each year there can not be an increase of prices nor any prosperity under a gold standard. When I use the word "prices" I mean a general level of prices.

What Mr. Bryan did say, not once but a hundred times, clearly expressed, and what in fair intendment he meant when he invoked the analogy of the law of gravitation, was that a stationary or decreasing volume of self-redeeming money must carry with it lessening wages and falling prices; that a decreasing volume of basic money and increasing wages and prices are contemporaneously impossible. Why, you yourself confess the converse in this debate when each and every one of you boast that there has been an increase of over $200,000,000 in the money in circulation among the people of the United States within the last year. And then you say to us, "You promised the people an increased circulation through the instrumentality of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and we have given them an increased circulation by an immense addition of gold money."

God save the mark! You and Mr. McKinley have given us this increased volume of gold money. Mr. McKinley is responsible and should have the credit for the discovery and the exploitation of the gold mines in South Africa and of those in the Klondike. Mr. McKinley and the Republican party should be kept in power because the cyanide process of treating gold ores has decreased the cost of production of gold and increased its volume to what extent exactly we do not know.

But, although your claim is ridiculous, it contains three admissions: First, that times as a whole have improved—that we are upon a more prosperous basis than we were in 1895; and secondly, that the cause of this improvement consists in a condition of higher prices—prices increasing and therefore encouraging production and industry, instead of the former condition of prices constantly falling and therefore discouraging production and disheartening producers; and third, that the cause of the rise in prices has been an increase in the volume of basic money in the shape of gold.

We admit these conditions and all they tend to show, all except the assumption involved in the last one, that the increased volume of gold has been owing to any act of yours. It has been due to an act of God, and God is in special partnership neither with your party nor with my own. You have the cart before the horse, just as you have when your orators say that the election of Mr. McKinley caused wheat to go up. They might with greater propriety say that the fact of the rise in the price of wheat elected Mr. McKinley. They can say with no measure of truth that the election of Mr. McKinley caused the rise in the price of wheat.

The fact is, as you well know, that wheat was higher for some time prior to the election of Mr. McKinley than it is to-day. I say that when Mr. Bryan uttered the words which are attributed to him, if he did utter them, he had in his mind the then condition of gold production. Conditions change; principles never. Unfortunately it is true that there are men in this world who can not see a principle under certain conditions. There are men who can not understand that the law of gravitation works when a balloon goes upward, or that the law of gravitation is not violated when a rocket is shot aloft in the air.

To show how conditions have changed to some extent, not in impeachment of our theory but in fulfillment of it, I will call your attention to an experience in my own career in this Hall. I stood upon the floor of this House in 1893 when gentlemen upon the other side of the Hall were objecting to the free and unlimited coinage of silver upon the ground that the annual production of the silver mines was so immense that the business of the world could not absorb it. The annual production of silver at that time was $210,000,000.

I made a labored argument in support of the proposition that after subtracting from this sum the amount of silver which must necessarily go into the arts and further subtracting the amount which would be taken by the Orient for money and by the limited-coinage countries for fractional and subsidiary currency, the United States alone could absorb in its business the balance left, and that if it could absorb it and use it, if there was a demand sufficient to use every dollar of it as money in the United States, free-coinage legislation here could hold the coins, gold and silver, at a parity.

I went further, and some of my colleagues thought went to an extreme, when I said that if not a dollar was used in the arts nor taken by the Orient nor went to the mints of Europe for subsidiary coinage, we could still absorb and use the entire $210,000,000. Gentlemen not only met that argument with doubt, but with denial, and some of them, I am afraid, with mental derision. The product of all the silver mines of the world at that time, as I have said, was $210,000,000 per annum.

I have forgotten the exact figures of the annual production of gold and can not now refer to them, but it was about $100,000,000, making a total of $319,000,000, of both gold and silver, to be added to the world's volume of money each year if every dollar of each metal were coined. What do we see now? I said then that the increase of the volume of the world's money by $210,000,000 could not only be absorbed, but absorbed with benefit to the industries and employments of the sons and daughters of men to their benefit, because the infiltration of the amount into the blood of commerce would stimulate industry, quicken prices, encourage producers, and lift debts. What do we see now, I repeat, with an annual production of gold alone of a little bit more or a little bit less than $300,000,000?

The world has absorbed it with benefit to everybody everywhere, with a quickening of prices upon the general level or average of staple commodities to the extent, however, of only 6 or 8 per cent. What was then denounced as repudiative inflation has since occurred by the accidents of discovery and by the incidents of invention and has inflated the general average of prices only 6 or 8 per cent! The Democratic party has never been the friend of either metal above or against the other. It is just as glad to see an increase of the basic money of the world through the instrumentality of gold as through that of silver.

The effect of its increase through the agency of gold has been to furnish an object lesson of the truth of our theory. That theory is the old and time-honored "quantitative" theory of money—the theory not announced but reiterated by John Stuart Mill when he said that, other things being equal, prices vary in proportion to the quantity of money.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen would stop to think but a moment, they would know that there must be a law which governs everything, and that there must be a law of exchangeable value; a law by means of which the price or exchangeable value of everything in this world, which is furnished in limited quantities and is, therefore, desired in exchange, is determined; a law which governs the value of Carmen's voice, of the agility of a ballet girl, of the services of an attorney, of the labor of the workmen, of the products of the soil, of the mines, and of the factory. That law you all know. It is the law of supply and demand, and in connection with every article of the world, except the gold and silver that are used for money, you admit that it is the determining law of value.

While gentlemen are talking about what Mr. Bryan said when he expressed himself hastily, let me call attention to what Mr. Carlisle, in a laboriously prepared and premeditated speech, said—and Mr. Carlisle is the greater intellect by long odds among the gold-standard men. He said that the quantity of money had nothing to do with its "purchasing power," with its exchangeable value, as you may call it; with its price, as you might say, varying the phrase. Yet every one of you is standing here to-day arguing that we have prosperity because of increased prices, and that we have increased prices because of the increased volume of money. It is true you make the false claim that your party has caused the increased volume of money, and that last claim is false.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if anybody wanted to determine how much wheat should be given or taken for a given quantity of cotton, he would want first to know what the estimated supply of wheat was and what its estimated possible consumption was, and then he would want to know what the estimated supply of cotton was and what the estimated demand of the mills for cotton would be. When he got answers to both queries, then he would know, and not until then would he know, what the price of cotton ought to be, measured in terms of wheat, or what the price of wheat ought to be, measured in terms of cotton. So when a man wants to know how much money should be given or taken for a given quantity of wheat or cotton, he wants to be informed as to the supply and demand in regard to the commodity in the first place, and of the supply and demand in regard to the money to be exchanged against it in the second place, and when he has colloated the two things he has the price of wheat or cotton, measured in terms of money.

The sort of predestination which I believe in is this: That God predestined that all things should obey and be determined in their relations to other things by certain fixed, determined, and immutable laws. The law of the operation of a thing's existence and fixing its relation to other things once discovered is what is called a "theory" in contradistinction to a hypothesis. Now, to state that it is true that the law which determines exchangeable values for all other things is a law from which money can escape—to state that it is true that God made one law of exchangeable value for everything in this world except money, and then made another law to determine the exchangeable value of money, would be to utter the rankest blasphemy.

What has become, my friends, of your old and time-honored argument of the overproduction of silver? Why, a gentleman from Iowa himself has told you in this debate that within twenty-five years the production of gold has increased 280 per cent and the production of silver 276 per cent. Now, my Republican colleague's figures may not be exactly right, but the lesson remains that there has been no overproduction of silver as compared with gold. But some one says, "You may overreach yourself by that argument, because when you use both metals as money the immense increase in their production will give you too much money."

I believe with Mr. Carlisle, I believe it was, who said in effect that "the world will be happy, indeed, if it should ever have a sufficient quantity of both metals for the uses of commerce and industry." In this very bill you are solicitously providing for a new form of paper money, or rather paper promises to pay money, to act as substitutes for money and to do the work of money in exchange. The whole world is to-day forced to do a great deal of its business with paper substitutes for money.

The volume of these paper substitutes in the world now is so immense that it is beyond the dream of man that there could be a sufficient production of silver to take the place of all of it, or a half of it, and yet as long as a single paper promise to pay, a single piece of so-called paper money—which is not merely a certificate of deposit of metal or coin—is used in the commerce of the world, just so long has the world before its eyes an object-lesson demonstration of the insufficiency of the precious metals. One of our Republican conferees in this debate said that "when the mills were opened that caused an increased circulation of money;" that "opening the mills made business profitable;" that then "money came out of its hoarding places into the active business of the world."

The gentleman has the cart before the horse again. It was the increased circulation that enabled the mills to open their doors, and not the opening of the mills which produced the increase in the volume of money. Think a moment. There must be somebody with money to buy goods before mills can sell them. The mills opened because they thought they saw a chance for profit in production. Now, Mr. Chairman, our increased circulation has been due to two facts—one applicable to us particularly and the other applicable to the world. Coincident with, or rather just prior to, the election of Mr. McKinley an unprecedented famine occurred in India.

Contemporaneously with it there was a decreased production of wheat in Russia and in the Argentine Republic, both our competitors in the exportation of wheat. At the same time, and for the first time in history, the Australian colonies imported instead of exporting wheat. At the same time, and most luckily for us, we produced an almost unprecedented crop. There was, therefore, an unusual supply on our hands to sell and a most unusual demand of the world for it. The wheat farmer obtained splendid prices.

He drew from all the rest of the world for payment of his crop an immense amount of gold, thus increasing our share of the world's gold. As he was paid he bought from the shoemaker, from the clothier, from the furniture dealer, from the manufacturer, from the miner, all that was necessary to supply his necessities. This quickened domestic trade. Even if there had been no permanent increase of the world's volume of metallic money, there would have been, because of these conditions, a temporary increase of the money in the United States, and therefore a local and a temporary rise in prices of most things.

The second factor in our increased circulation I have incidentally called attention to already, namely, the immense addition to the volume of the world's money by the immensely increased production of the world's gold, first by discovery and secondly by new processes, cheapening and therefore extending production. My friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] says that "people have found that things have changed." In view of these facts, I should imagine so. But the quiet and absurd assumption in his remark was that the Republican party had changed them.

The argument has also been used in this debate, in a quibbling way, which shows lack of intellectual integrity, that neither the first section of this bill nor the act of 1873 made gold the standard of value in this country; that the act of 1834, passed under the Democratic Administration of Andrew Jackson, worked this result. The simple answer to all that is this: That the law of coinage to which reference is made, which was passed under the Administration of that great Democrat in 1834, kept the mints of the United States open to both gold and silver in unlimited quantities, free of charge for mintage, at the ratio of 16 to 1. If, then, that be gold monometallism, as I have said upon the floor of this House once before, we will not quarrel about words.

Give us the law of Andrew Jackson to which you refer. We will call it bimetalism, and you may call it gold monometallism. We will have what we want whatever you call it, namely, the free coinage of every ounce of gold or silver which may be brought to the mints at the ratio of 16 to 1. It is true in the debates in Congress when that bill was passed some gentlemen, and among them Democrats, said that they wanted the "gold standard."

But gentlemen who are at once informed and candid will admit that they used the word in the sense of a gold circulation—a law to produce a gold circulation. For reasons which I have indicated in another part of these remarks, it did give a gold circulation, but it did not give us a gold standard. I am informed by my friend Mr. Towne, of Minnesota, and my recollection accords with his, that Dana Horton counted up some eight or nine senses in which the word standard was used by loose thinkers, loose talkers, and loose writers.

Let us not quarrel about words; ideas, things, ought to cause the base of difference between us, or else there ought to be none. But it is rather humorous to hear a gentleman say that we had the gold standard as early as 1834, and then to hear him say that "If there were any doubts about it, they were removed in 1853;" and that "If there were any doubts about it then, they were removed in 1873;" and that "If there were any doubts about it then, they were removed in 1893;" and that "If there is any doubt about it now, it will be removed by this bill."

A thing which seems to be such dead certainty that very nearly all the balance of a life of a nation must be spent in "removing doubts" as to whether it was done at all or not must constitute a very exceedingly uncertain certainty, or a very marvelously certain uncertainty.

One more remark. If it be true, as both sides seem to be now agreed that it is true, that we have to-day a state of affairs prosperous by comparison with what they were three or four years ago, and that this comparative prosperity is owing to higher prices, and that these higher prices are owing to an increased circulation of money, which has taken place under this Administration, then it is worthy of your reflection, carrying the argument backward, to consider why it is not true that this increase of circulation would have been still greater if we had had not only the annual crop of gold, but, in addition to that, the annual crop of silver coined into self-redeeming money, and, further, why it is not true that if we had had an increase of circulation that much greater than our present increase, prices would not have been that much higher and prosperity that much greater.

But, Mr. Chairman, while there has been a comparative increase of prices on the average of 6 to 8 per cent, and while this increase has been healthful and beneficent, because natural and because it was due to the decreased purchasing power of money—that decreased purchasing power being, in its turn, due to the increased volume of money—there has been in some lines of production an abnormal, unnatural, unhealthful, and malevolent increase of prices. I say this because an increase of prices which comes about by strangling competition, by extinguishing individualism, and by dispensing with the labor and services of workingmen and traveling men is necessarily unhealthful and dangerous. The abnormal increase to which I refer has been in the prices of such articles as are controlled by trusts—barbed wire, for instance—which has advanced, I am informed, about 100 per cent—steel nails, tin and tin wares, and various other things entirely too numerous to recount. The increased price, which does not go in due proportion to the laborer and to the producer of the raw material, but which represents only an increased and undue profit to the capitalist, is not such an increase as can lead to the betterment of the conditions of mankind generally, nor to increased happiness for the masses of men, nor to their increased love for home, liberty, or country. I do not propose to argue the trust question.

I merely want to warn my hearers against confusing the prices of these particular articles thus artificially and, I hope, temporarily put up, with the natural and normal, though slight, rise of prices which has taken place with commodities generally, owing to the decreased purchasing power of the gold dollar, caused by an increase of the number of gold dollars.

Now I will listen to the question of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. McCLEARY. The gentleman's statement—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Before you ask your question I want to say that a gentleman from Washington rose the other day and "made some unnecessary remarks." I do not know why it is that the State of Washington indulges in representative picturesqueness on both sides of the House—on our side in the last Congress, on yours in this—but it seems to be a fact. [Laughter.] He said that if any Democrat could explain to him why it was that when we had them tied together by a legislative ratio the moneys parted, or the metals, which ever it was, he would vote for this bill.

In a previous part of my remarks I have explained it. If he meant the metals, the answer is, because of a conflicting and stronger legislative ratio; if he meant the moneys, the answer is, they did not, but each was the equal in exchangeability with the other. "Why does a given amount of water with a fish in it weigh the same as the same quantity of water without a fish in it." I once heard that question answered, "Because it don't."

I have not explained it for the purpose of obtaining the vote of the gentleman from Washington, because we are going to certain defeat on this bill and I rather it would not be defeat accompanied with shame, but I think I have secured his vote upon his own contract if I would take it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCLEARY. The gentleman's statement of facts, as I understand it, appears rather contradictory. I must have misunderstood him. If the silver did not retire, although you have said it did—if the minor silver coinage did not retire, what was the purpose of the act of 1853? Now, I will put my two questions together.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This is the first time that the act of 1853 has come into the discussion. Ask me about that.

Mr. McCLEARY. I have asked you about it just now. I understand the gentleman to say that the mistake of Hamilton was that he did not adopt the ratio of the world. Would it be a mistake now for us to do it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Without any other bimetallic nation, we would make the ratio of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There would be no conflict in legislative ratios; that is all.

Mr. McCLEARY. Will you state the purpose of the act of 1853?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I said a little while ago that the gentleman from Minnesota said we did not come down the aisle with our free-silver bills proposing them as substitutes. He says that is a Democratic inconsistency. I have shown that we do not because your special rule prevents. There are Republican inconsistencies, though. I do not believe much in the ad hominem, claptrap, "you-are-an-inconsistent-fellow" sort of an argument. I believe that, wherever a man comes to the conclusion that he has been wrong in the past and changes his mind, provided he does not take advantage of his people and change his base before he gives them a fair opportunity to see whether they are willing to support him in that change or not—for that is dishonest and lying—if he comes before them and frankly says, "I have changed my mind," they may not reelect him, but they will always respect him.

When you change your mind I believe all you have got to do is not to lie about it, but to say, "Yes, I formerly thought this; therefore I voted in this way. Now I think thus, and therefore I shall vote in this other way. If I thought as I formerly did, I would vote as I formerly did." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But there is another reason why I do not care to charge the Republican party with the inconsistency of their attitudes now and in 1896. I said upon the stump in 1896 that they were going to be inconsistent, and so did all of us.

I knew as well in the latter part of the Fifty-fourth Congress and in the Fifty-fifth Congress that gentlemen from Iowa, gentlemen from Illinois, and gentlemen from Kansas, if they remained in the Republican party, would have to make a change of base upon the money question as I knew that I was existing. And so during the campaign of 1896 I said so. I said that under the veil of "international bimetalism" you were hiding the gold standard. I said that under the veil of a "safe" currency you were going to withdraw the greenbacks and hand over all the paper currency issuance to the banks. I said that under the veil of "anti-repudiation" you yourselves were going to repudiate the silver dollar and your "bimetallic" platform. Why should I complain now when you have only done what I said and knew you would do?

Now, one other sentence and I am done. My friend Mr. DOTLIVER, with his eloquence, not alone "physical eloquence," as somebody said, but mental and moral eloquence—a grand fellow, and I like to hear him talk—said here the other day that Bryan said that "they had killed half the money of the country," and that the people had found out that that was not the fact—that not a silver dollar had been "killed." What we meant was that they had killed half of the annual crop of money by denying the annual product of silver access to the mints. That was true, was it not? The money already coined you had not then killed.

But now, to-day, in this bill you propose to do that. In the campaign of 1896 I said that in addition to having killed the annual crop as it came up you would kill the stock on hand in some way if you ever got full power. And now, although you are not literally "killing" it, you are "impounding" it. What is the difference between killing a horse and taking him out of harness and "impounding" him, swearing he shall never serve any more? For all practical horse purposes he would be dead. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has five minutes of this hour remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield that five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ].

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes allowed me I can hope to do little more than voice the protest of the good people who sent me here against both the matter and the manner of the legislation proposed in this bill.

Denied the privilege of considering its provisions in committee, denied the right of offering in its stead an alternative proposition, denied even a knowledge of its propositions until it was sprung upon this House, and with a debate limited by cast-iron rules which were forced upon us by a compact, caucus-ruled majority, we on this side of the House can hope, sir, to do no more than indignantly protest, however unavailing that protest may be.

Gagged in this way as we are, gentlemen on that side complain of us when we complain, charging us with useless consumption of time, reminding me of the little fellow who called to his father: "Pap, come here and make Bud behave himself. Every time I hit him on the head with the hammer he hollers." [Laughter.] The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] derisively asks what predictions made by the Democrats in 1896 have been fulfilled.

I had the honor, sir, of being a Democratic electoral candidate in 1896, and in an active canvass I daily charged that the Republican party was hypocritical in its platform pretense of favoring bimetalism; that any effort of a Republican administration to secure international bimetalism would be perfunctory and for political effect only, and that if successful in electing William McKinley President that party would, in defiance of its pledges, force the single gold standard upon the people of this country.

My Republican opponents indignantly denied these charges, as did my distinguished colleague [Mr. LINNEY] who sits upon the other side of this Chamber, and as did the distinguished Republican Senator from North Carolina, neither of whom would be here to-day but for their professed friendliness to bimetalism.

Our people were assured that the Republican party was honestly in favor of bimetalism and that they differed from us only as to the best and safest manner of securing it. In the light of subsequent events, and particularly in the light of this proposed legislation, I can unhesitatingly point to these fulfilled charges and predictions in answer to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, why is this legislation demanded at this time? Why in this year, intermediate between Presidential elections, when neither party declared in favor of a permanent single gold standard in the last Presidential campaign, both declaring, on the contrary, in favor of bimetalism, and when an era of unparalleled prosperity is claimed by our friends on the other side; when it is boasted that we are already under the gold standard, with all its alleged blessings; when the people of this great country at the very latest opportunity have declared in favor of bimetalism by the election of William McKinley upon a professedly bimetallic platform—why, I ask, should the serenity of the politico-financial atmosphere be disturbed at this time by the attempted passage of this revolutionary measure?

I may be mistaken, Mr. Chairman, but in my opinion, sir, it is largely because, in the results of the recent elections, in the reduced Republican majority in this House, the forces behind the Republican party see the handwriting on the wall and realize that if this legislation is not forced at this juncture the opportunity may never again present itself to that party to write the single gold standard into the laws of our land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, gentlemen, in your eager haste to falsify your past pretensions, in your willingness to stultify yourselves to do the bidding of past and prospective campaign contributors, let me warn you that this bill, which carries in its belly a whole catalogue of woes, though it may be forced upon us here by unusual and revolutionary methods, is yet to pass under the consideration of an intelligent and indignant people.

When they learn, as learn they will, that you have been false to your professions and platforms; that you have covertly but effectually destroyed the greenback; that you have added silver to the endless chain for withdrawing gold from the Treasury; that you have changed every contract now in existence or hereafter to be made, public and private, in favor of the creditor and against the debtor by writing the cruel word "gold" into it; that you have abdicated the constitutional right of controlling the currency of this country to the sole control of the national banks; that you have renounced the right of Congress to control the issue of interest-bearing bonds and conferred that supreme and dangerous power upon the Secretary of the Treasury; that you have stricken down at one fell swoop $900,000,000 of legal-tender money and made gold the sole money of payment in the United States, leaving in circulation only gold and national bank notes, my word for it, Mr. Chairman, a political revolution such as this country has never seen will sweep, as with a besom of destruction, from place and power the party which could dare to force this infamous legislation upon a deceived and outraged people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, when the debate upon this bill had reached a most exciting period, while orators upon either side, for and against it, were scattering wit and wisdom, logic, sarcasm, and eloquence in great profusion, a distinguished member of this House, one who had rendered valuable services to his country both on the field of battle and in the halls of legislation, was seated quietly in his chair, his hands folded peacefully upon his breast, reposing quietly in the arms of Morpheus, utterly unconscious of the tempestuous storms being waged around him. The distinguished gentleman typified the attitude of the people toward this debate. For the time being he represented 75,000,000 of his countrymen. The time for real, earnest, and serious discussion of the principles involved in this bill, a discussion which is aimed to convince the reason and influence the action, long since passed.

The people of the United States have passed upon every issue involved in this debate. They have made up their minds upon every question discussed. Their opinions have been intensified and fixed by the course of current events and business conditions. Expressed emphatically in 1896, they have been reaffirmed whenever the opportunity has been presented. They expect of this Congress not reasons, but action; not discussion, but legislation. Our duty is, as promptly as possible, to record the verdict of the people, enter up their judgment, and give expression to their will in the laws of the land. There is little that is new proposed by this bill. We have been practically and legally under the gold standard for more than sixty years. The issue presented in 1896, fairly and squarely before the people, was whether we should maintain the existing gold standard or go to the silver standard. There was a time when people advocating the free coinage of silver might fairly and conscientiously believe that it would restore the parity between gold and silver at the old ratio and would not disturb their existing financial standards.

Up to 1878 the value of silver as compared with gold in a hundred years had not varied to exceed 5 per cent. No one at that time could foresee present conditions. In 1873, at a ratio of 16 to 1, the silver dollar was worth more than gold. In 1878 men could fairly believe that the slight decline in silver could be overcome by restoration of silver to free coinage; but it is impossible to believe that any thinking, intelligent man in the United States during late years, in the face of conditions that have surrounded us, could have possibly believed that the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 meant other than the silver standard. When the Senate of the United States was considering the Teller resolution, an amendment was proposed by Senator NELSON, as follows:

It is the duty of the Government of the United States under existing laws to maintain the parity in value of its gold and silver money, so that the dollar of the one metal shall for all monetary purposes always be equal in value to the dollar of the other metal.

This amendment was laid upon the table by the vote of the members of the United States Senate favoring the free coinage of silver. They recognized the fact that if the policy of the Teller resolution were carried out and free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 should be adopted, it would be impossible to maintain the parity of gold and silver; in other words, that it would precipitate us to the silver standard.

Frightful calamities, it is said, will follow the enactment of this bill into law. This is but a repetition of the numerous and fearful prophecies of evil that were repeated with so much fervor upon every Bryan hustings in the United States in 1896. But "there were false prophets in the lands in those days." At the time of the last national election there were none so rash as to claim that any business prosperity existed among any class of our people or in any section of our country. The most hopeful could see no light upon the horizon except in the prospect of Republican success.

Now there is none to deny that a fair measure of business prosperity is in every State of the Union. The wheels of returning and returned industry are making sweet music everywhere. Labor is employed, wages are remunerative, the hungry are fed not by the hand of charity, but from the fruits of their own industry. What has wrought this magical change? Standing out as conspicuous causes are two great economic events—the determination of the American people, expressed with emphasis in November, 1896, and repeated on every appropriate occasion, to maintain the gold standard and an honest monetary policy, to permit no tampering with the measures of values, and the return to the national policy of protecting and fostering the industry of our own people.

The principal arguments, if arguments they can be called, that have emanated from the other side of the House during the discussion upon this bill have consisted of statements regarding the utterances, votes, or opinions of leading Republicans ten, twenty, thirty years ago, supposed to be inconsistent with the principles of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who regard consistency as the most exalted of virtues. It is much more important to be right than to be consistent. Consistency has too often been the bugbear of small minds. It has prevented men, through a pride of opinion, from announcing honest convictions. It has demanded that the opinions formed hastily, upon insufficient data and upon slight information and examination, shall stand against the deliberate and mature judgment formed upon a full investigation and wider knowledge of all the facts and principles involved. It too often exalts the opinions of youth over the judgment of mature manhood. It values hasty first impressions more highly than carefully formed judgments. It holds to error men who are willing to be wrong rather than withstand the charge of inconsistency. When investigation and thought and experience and the deliberate judgment of matured manhood, when careful research upon full knowledge of all the facts involved ceases to be valuable, then consistency may be elevated, may become one of the greatest of virtues. But for myself, Mr. Chairman, I prefer to be right, even if to be right involves a change of hastily formed and erroneous opinions.

But, Mr. Chairman, upon the questions at issue under this bill a large majority of the other side of the House are neither right nor consistent. There have been no expressions of opinion or sentiments on the floor of this House, either in this Congress or the last, that could evoke more vociferous applause from members on that side of the House than the denunciation of Grover Cleveland, and especially his views upon financial questions. When anyone on that side of the House desired to secure the applause of his brethren he was always sure of meeting their hearty approval by a strong denunciation of Grover Cleveland. The more intemperate the language, the more outrageous the epithets, the more coarse the vituperation, the more vociferous the applause. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] received no more vigorous applause from his party associates for any utterance that he made upon this floor during the last Congress than when, comparing Grover Cleveland to Benedict Arnold, he apologized to the shades of Arnold. Comparing him to Judas Iscariot, he asserted that Judas was a good deal the better man, because he had the decency to hang himself.

I want to remind these gentlemen that there was a time when in their estimation no man in the United States or in the civilized world stood higher than Grover Cleveland. There was a time when no panegyrics were too extravagant, when he was held as the one great Democrat since Andrew Jackson, when no other Democrat could so unite his party or could so sweep the country. Has this change of feeling been produced by any change of principles on the part of Grover Cleveland? On that question I want to remind our friends on the other side of some undeniable facts of history. When Mr. Cleveland was first nominated in 1884, notwithstanding the many contests over the silver question, there had been at that time no utterance by any Democratic national convention in favor of free silver. The platform adopted by the Democratic convention of that year declared:

We believe in honest money, the gold and standard coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss.

On this platform Mr. Cleveland was elected.

Now, it is not my province to defend that gentleman or to vouch for the genuineness of his Democracy. In fact it is extremely difficult during these troublesome times to define Democracy. It seems to have run away from itself. It seems to be wearing a different garment and professing different principles, and changing both garments and principles so often that it is impossible to define it. I do want, however, to say that whatever political sins the late President of the United States may have been guilty of, he did not skulk into the Presidential chair in 1892, nor did he flinch the nomination or election from the Democratic party during that year by disguising or concealing the principles for which he is now so severely denounced by those who were his abject worshipers then, his traducers now.

His position on financial questions was as well known then as it is now. His adherence to the gold standard, his hostility to the further coinage of silver, was publicly and repeatedly proclaimed. Before he had been installed into the Presidency the first time, when the amount of silver coined in the United States was not more than one-third of what it is now, long before the Sherman law was passed, Mr. Cleveland made known in a public way his hostility to the further coinage of that metal. He not only was opposed to free coinage, but opposed any further coinage of silver at that time. In a letter addressed to Hon. A. J. Warner and other members of the Forty-eighth Congress, written on the 24th day of February, 1885, and published on page 363 of the Writings and Speeches of Grover Cleveland, his views were fully and clearly expressed. That letter is as follows:

ALBANY, February 24, 1885.

To the Hon. A. J. WARNER and others,
Members of the Forty-eighth Congress.

GENTLEMEN: The letter which I have had the honor to receive from you invites, and, indeed, obliges me, to give expression to some grave public necessities, although in advance of the moment when they would become the objects of my official care and partial responsibility. Your solicitude that my judgment shall have been carefully and deliberately formed is entirely just, and I accept the suggestion in the same friendly spirit in which it has been made. It is also fully justified by the nature of the financial crisis, which, under the operation of the act of Congress of February 28, 1878, is now close at hand. By a compliance with the requirements of that law all the vaults of the Federal Treasury have been and are heaped full of silver coins, which are now worth less than 85 per cent of the gold dollar prescribed as "the unit of value" in section 14 of the act of February 12, 1873, and which, with the silver certificates representing such coin, are receivable for all public dues. Being thus receivable, while also constantly increasing in quantity at the rate of $28,000,000 a year, it has followed of necessity that the flow of gold into the Treasury has been steadily diminished.

Silver and silver certificates have displaced and are now displacing gold, and the sum of gold in the Federal Treasury now available for the payment of the gold obligations of the United States and for the redemption of the United States notes called "greenbacks," if not already encroached upon, is perilously near such encroachment.

These are facts which, as they do not admit of difference of opinion, call for no argument. They have been forewarned to us in the official reports of every Secretary of the Treasury from 1873 until now. They are plainly affirmed in the last December report of the present Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the present House of Representatives. They appear in the official documents of this Congress and in the records of the New York clearing house, of which the Treasury is a member, and through which the bulk of the receipts and payments of the Federal Government and of the country pass.

These being the facts of our present condition, our danger and our duty to avert the danger would seem to be plain. I hope that you concur with me and with the great majority of our fellow-citizens in deeming it most desirable at the present juncture to maintain and continue in use the mass of our gold coin as well as the mass of our silver already coined. This is possible by a present suspension of the purchase and coinage of silver. I am not aware that by any other method it is possible. It is of momentous importance to prevent the two metals from parting company; to prevent the increasing displacement of gold by the increasing coinage of silver; to prevent the disuse of gold in the custom-houses of the United States in the daily business of the people; to prevent the ultimate expulsion of gold by silver.

Such a financial crisis as these events would certainly precipitate, were it not to follow upon so long a period of commercial depression, would involve the people of every city and every State in the Union in a prolonged and disastrous trouble. The revival of business enterprise and prosperity so ardently desired and apparently so near, would be hopelessly postponed. Gold would be withdrawn to its hoarding places, and an unprecedented contraction in the actual volume of our currency would speedily take place. Saddest of all, in every workshop, mill, factory, store, and on every railroad and farm the wages of labor, already depressed, would suffer still further depression by a scaling down of the purchasing power of every so-called dollar paid into the hand of toil. From these impending calamities it is surely a most patriotic and grateful duty of the representatives of the people to deliver them.

I am, gentlemen, with sincere respect, your fellow-citizen,
GROVER CLEVELAND.

There could be no misunderstanding of this language. It was a distinct assertion that the continued use of gold as well as silver was only possible "by a present suspension of the purchase and coinage of silver." At that time Mr. Cleveland had been elected as President of the United States. But if that had not been sufficient to make clear his position on this question and make his views sufficiently public, this was certainly done in his first annual message to Congress, December 8, 1885. In that message, which was somewhat lengthy, he used the following words:

Nothing more important than the present condition of our currency and coinage can claim your attention.

Since February, 1873, the Government has, under the compulsory provisions of law, purchased silver bullion and coined the same at the rate of more than $2,000,000 every month. By this process up to the present date, 215,759,431 silver dollars have been coined.

A reasonable appreciation of a delegation of power to the General Government would limit its exercise, without express restrictive words, to the people's needs and the requirements of the public welfare.

Upon this theory the authority to "coin money" given to Congress by the Constitution, if it permits the purchase by the Government of bullion for coinage in any event, does not justify such purchase and coinage to an extent beyond the amount needed for a sufficient circulating medium.

The desire to utilize the silver product of the country should not lead to a misuse or the perversion of this power.

The necessity for such an addition to the silver currency of the nation as is compelled by the silver-coinage act is negated by the fact that up to the present time only about 50,000,000 of the silver dollars so coined have actually found their way into circulation, leaving more than 165,000,000 in the possession of the Government, the custody of which has entailed a considerable expense for the construction of vaults for its deposit. Against this latter amount there are outstanding silver certificates amounting to about $30,000,000.

Every month two millions of gold in the public Treasury are paid out for two millions or more of silver dollars, to be added to the idle mass already accumulated.

When the time comes that gold has been withdrawn from circulation, then will be apparent the difference between the real value of the silver dollar and a dollar in gold, and the two coins will part company. Gold, still the standard of value and necessary in our dealings with other countries, will be at a premium over silver; banks which have substituted gold for the deposits of their customers may pay them with silver bought with such gold, thus making a handsome profit; rich speculators will sell their hoarded gold to their neighbors, who need it to liquidate their foreign debts, at a ruinous premium over silver; and the laboring men and women of the land, most defenseless of all, will find that the dollar received for the wage of their toil has sadly shrunk in its purchasing power.

Those who do not fear any disastrous consequences arising from the continued compulsory coinage of silver as now directed by law and who suppose that the addition to the currency of the country intended as its results will be a public benefit are reminded that history demonstrates that the point is easily reached in the attempt to float at the same time two sorts of money of different excellence, when the better will cease to be in general circulation. The hoarding of gold, which has already taken place, indicates that we shall not escape the usual experience in such cases. So, if this silver coinage be continued, we may reasonably expect that gold and its equivalent will abandon the field of circulation to silver alone. This, of course, must produce a severe contraction of our circulating medium instead of adding to it.

We have now on hand all the silver dollars necessary to supply the present needs of the people and to satisfy those who from sentiment wish to see them in circulation, and if their coinage is suspended they can be readily obtained by all who desire them. If the need of more is at any time apparent, their coinage may be renewed.

That disaster has not already overtaken us furnishes no proof that danger does not wait upon a continuation of the present silver coinage. We have been saved by the most careful management and unusual expedients, by a combination of fortunate conditions, and by a confident expectation that the course of the Government in regard to silver coinage would be speedily changed by the action of Congress.

Prosperity hesitates upon the threshold because of the dangers and uncertainties surrounding this question. Capital timidly shrinks from trade, and investors are unwilling to take the chance of the questionable shape in which their money will be returned to them, while enterprise halts at a risk against which care and sagacious management do not protect.

As a necessary consequence labor lacks employment, and suffering and distress are visited upon a portion of our fellow-citizens especially entitled to the careful consideration of those charged with the duties of legislation. No interest appeals to us so strongly for a safe and stable currency as the vast army of the unemployed.

I recommend the suspension of the compulsory coinage of silver dollars, directed by the law passed in February, 1873.

Congress did not accept his advice or indorse his recommendation. Again, in his second annual message, sent to Congress December 6, 1886, he repeated the statement of his reasons why he believed the suspension of the silver coinage was necessary. On that subject his message is as follows:

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1886, there were coined, under the compulsory silver-coinage act of 1873, 29,838,905 silver dollars, and the cost of the silver used in such coinage was $23,448,960.01. There had been coined up to the close of the previous fiscal year under the provisions of the law 203,882,554 silver dollars, and on the 1st day of December, 1886, the total amount of such coinage was $247,131,549.

The Director of the Mint reports that at the time of the passage of the law of 1873 directing this coinage the intrinsic value of the dollars thus coined was 94 cents each, and that on the 31st day of July, 1886, the price of silver reached the lowest stage ever known, so that the intrinsic or bullion price of our standard silver dollar at that date was less than 72 cents. The price of silver on the 30th day of November last was such as to make these dollars intrinsically worth 78 cents each.

These differences in value of the coins represent the fluctuations in the price of silver, and they certainly do not indicate that compulsory coinage by the Government enhances the price of that commodity or secures uniformity in its value.

Every fair and legal effort has been made by the Treasury Department to distribute this currency among the people. The withdrawal of the United States Treasury notes of small denominations and the issuing of small silver certificates have been resorted to in the endeavor to accomplish this result, in obedience to the will and sentiments of the representatives of the people in the Congress. On the 27th day of November, 1886, the people held of these coins or certificates representing them the nominal sum of $166,873,941, and we still had $79,464,345 in the Treasury, as against about $142,894,055 in the hands of the people and $78,865,376 remaining in the Treasury one year ago. The Director of the Mint again urges the necessity of more vault room for the purpose of storing these silver dollars which are not needed for circulation by the people.

I have seen no reason to change the views expressed in my last annual message on the subject of this compulsory coinage; and I again urge its suspension on all the grounds contained in my former recommendation, reinforced by the significant increase of our gold exportations during the last year, as appears by the comparative statement herewith presented, and for the further reasons that the more this currency is distributed amongst the people the greater becomes our duty to protect it from disaster; that we now have abundance for all our needs, and that there seems but little propriety in building vaults to store such currency when the only pretense for its coinage is the necessity of its use by the people as a circulating medium.

Again, in his final message to Congress on December 3, 1888, after the Presidential election, he reiterates his views and position upon the silver question in the following language:

At the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, there had been coined under the compulsory silver-coinage act $266,988,290 in silver dollars, $55,394,310 of which were in the hands of the people.

On the 30th day of June, 1888, there had been coined $299,708,790, and of this $55,829,303 was in circulation in coin and $240,887,376 in silver certificates, for the redemption of which silver dollars to that amount were held by the Government.

On the 30th day of November, 1888, $312,570,000 had been coined, $60,970,990 of the silver dollars were actually in circulation, and $237,418,346 in certificates.

The Secretary recommends the suspension of the further coinage of silver, and in such recommendation I earnestly concur.

Gentlemen, you will remember that there was a time between the Presidential election of 1888 and that of 1892 when Senator Hill, of New York, seemed to be looming up into Presidential proportion and was apparently the choice of the Democrats in the United States as their candidate for President. He had been elected triumphantly as Senator from New York. He had been visiting Southern States and received with great enthusiasm. He was looked forward to as the future leader of Democracy. His position on the financial question seemed to be doubtful. It was not satisfactory. At that time, and when it seemed to the people at large that Cleveland had been forgotten, he wrote the following letter to the Reform Club, of New York, February 10, 1891:

E. ELLERY ANDERSON, Chairman.

DEAR SIR: I have this afternoon received your note inviting me to attend to-morrow evening the meeting called for the purpose of voicing the opposition of the business men of our city to "the free coinage of silver in the United States."

I shall not be able to attend and address the meeting as you request, but I am glad that the business interests of New York are at last to be heard upon this subject. It surely can not be necessary for me to make a formal expression of my agreement with those who believe that the greatest peril would be invited by the adoption of the scheme embraced in the measure now pending in Congress for the unlimited coinage of silver at our mints.

If we have developed an unexpected capacity for the assimilation of a largely increased volume of this currency, and even if we have demonstrated the usefulness of such an increase, these conditions fall short of insuring us against disaster if in the present situation we enter upon the dangerous and reckless experiment of free, unlimited, and independent silver coinage.

Yours, very truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

This letter was published in nearly every leading journal in the United States, East and West, North and South. Its effect was electrical. It served as a rallying cry for Democrats everywhere. The masses of the people, if not the political leaders, began to form around the banners of Grover Cleveland. Leaders endeavored to prevent his nomination, but they were trampled under foot. The South overrode New York, and when the national convention was held Grover Cleveland was selected as the nominee of the Democratic party for President by an overwhelming majority and amid intense enthusiasm. There has not been in this generation any Democrat who has been so universally lauded, praised, and almost worshiped by the Democratic party as their last President. His triumphant election by an overwhelming majority followed.

Can people who supported him then say they did not indorse his position on financial questions; that they did not know his views and opinions then; that his financial principles had been concealed? Certainly no intelligent Democrat can make such a statement. It was the principles that he professed, the principles to which he adhered, his outspoken utterances of them, his freedom from anything that looked like concealment or hypocrisy, the fact that the Democratic party believed in him and his Democracy, that made him the nominee and resulted in his overwhelming election. The Democratic conventions throughout the United States not only wanted Cleveland, but in many instances expressed their belief in his financial views. The Democratic convention of the State in which I live met in the city of Portland on April 20, 1892. It was unanimous for the renomination of Cleveland. It sent a unanimous delegation to support him in the national convention. It appointed its best men as a committee to construct its platform. There was a representative from every county in the State. The financial portion of that platform adopted by that convention was as follows:

The Democracy of Oregon hereby express their confidence in the courage, honesty, and statesmanship of Grover Cleveland and recognize him as a man preeminently qualified to fill the office of President of the United States.

We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and in currency convertible into such coinage without loss and of sufficient volume to meet all the demands of the people; we demand that all money coined or issued by the United States should be of equal monetary value and of equal purchasing power for the rich and the poor, and that all paper currency issued by the Government should be redeemable in either gold or silver coin, at the option of the holder and not at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The meaning and intent of that convention was not misunderstood in the State of Oregon. Governor Penneyer, who had been elected by the Democrats, announced his intention not to vote for the nominees because the Democratic party "had gone back on free coinage."

The Wisconsin Democratic convention, held at Milwaukee on May 14, 1892, adopted a platform containing this provision:

We maintain that the true interests of the people demand a sound, honest, and stable money, composed of or based on and redeeming in gold and silver coin of equal intrinsic value. We therefore oppose the project of an unlimited coinage of silver dollars of less commercial value than the gold dollars as un-Democratic, dishonest, and especially hurtful to the farmers and laboring classes.

I have not the platforms of the different State conventions during that year, but the foregoing sample suffices to show that the Democratic party at that time was in accord with Grover Cleveland upon the financial question. The national convention did not act in ignorance. It knew what it was doing. It intended that their platform and candidate should be in harmony. While the convention was in session the Associated Press sent out the following dispatches:

CHICAGO, June 21.

The silver States held another caucus this afternoon, and in view of Gorman's refusal to permit the use of his name as a candidate for the Presidency, it was decided to cast their vote for Governor Boies. A subcommittee was appointed, headed by Patterson, of Colorado, for the purpose of presenting the silver views of the Western delegates to the committee on resolutions.

The history of that convention has been written. The views from the silver States were not adopted. The platform of that convention was in accordance with the principles of the candidate. It demanded the repeal of the only law then upon the statute book providing for the coinage of silver. It will be remembered that during President Cleveland's first term the Bland law was then in force. It required the purchase of less than one-half of the silver required by the Sherman law.

When President Cleveland was renominated, in 1892, the Sherman law was in force. He had recommended the suspension of the coinage of silver under the Bland law. What, then, could be the meaning of that portion of the platform that denounces the Sherman Act of 1890?

The Sherman Act of 1890 is a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future, which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal.

This was not a demand for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, but a demand for the repeal of the entire act. It meant the wiping out of the last vestige of legislation that provided for the coinage of silver. It is true, this was not all the platform demanded. It declared—against either metal or charge for mintage, but the dollar of unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, or to be adjusted through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin.

We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating

Has any Democrat on this floor or in any other place proposed the enactment of any law coining gold and silver by any such proportions that the dollar of each shall be of equal intrinsic value? Is there any member of that party in the United States now advocating such a doctrine? Was it expected at that time that anyone would do so? Had any bill ever been introduced upon that line? Has any ever been introduced since? Does anyone claim now that the coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1 would be dollars of equal intrinsic value or equal exchangeable value, or that they could be maintained at a parity?

How was the nomination of Cleveland and the platform adopted regarded in Congress? In that Congress the Democrats had a very large majority, something over two-thirds in the House of Representatives. Mr. Bland was chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. He introduced House bill No. 4426, on the free coinage of silver. It was referred to his own committee and reported back for favorable consideration. There was a strong report by a minority of the committee, and this was signed by Charles Tracey, a Democrat from New York, and George Fred Williams, a Democratic member of the House from Massachusetts, and subsequently a very earnest advocate of free coinage. The House, in February of that year, fixed the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of March for the consideration of the bill. At the end of three days, after numerous speeches and a full discussion, occupying nearly 200 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, this Democratic House, presided over by Speaker Crisp, the bill in the charge of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Bland, failed even to reach a vote.

A motion to lay the bill upon the table received 149 votes for to 149 votes against. A motion to reconsider that was carried by 150 votes against 148. The House adjourned after numerous roll calls without bringing the bill to a vote. Subsequent to the meeting of the Democratic national convention, and in July of that year, the Senate of the United States passed a free-coinage bill and sent it to the House for consideration. On the 13th day of July the Committee on Rules reported a resolution for the consideration of this bill, the consideration to be continued from day to day until finally disposed of. While that rule was under discussion, Mr. Clark, a Democratic member of the House from Alabama, and prior to that day an ardent advocate of free coinage, opposed taking up the bill for consideration, and, among other things, said:

Is it pressed on this House to place Democratic members on record as favoring such free coinage? There have been several test votes, and it is well known that when now taken it will show changes against the bill on the part of Democrats who wish, as I do, to fight the enemy upon the ground upon which the whole party can and will stand united. Therefore, if that vote is to be forced by Democratic leaders in this House to make a Democratic record or to fix Democratic policy, it is from their own standpoint ill advice, because it will disclose growing weakness instead of strength. [Applause.] Besides, we are not authorized to make a platform for the Democratic party or to declare its policy upon that subject. That has been done lately by the Democratic national convention. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Apparently, few of us were commissioned as delegates to that convention, to make that platform or declare that policy. In voting for this bill we shall simply once more declare and record our individual views, with no expectation of enacting them into law. Why should we embarrass or weaken our party simply to emphasize personal views already recorded? On the other hand, I should vote against it, because since this House has thoroughly discussed and repeatedly voted upon this proposition the Democratic party has held its national convention and has framed and published its declaration of a policy upon this subject clearly inconsistent with the bill now proposed.

It did not accept the silver-coinage plank without clearly comprehending it. An able and zealous advocate of just such legislation as is now pressed on us urged upon the convention an amendment of the coinage plank, but could not secure support enough to call the roll of the States. Respecting as I do the sentiments of my own constituents above all others, I find support in the fact that 22 delegates from the State of Alabama, representing every part of the State, men of distinction, wise, strong, and patriotic, whom any country might be proud to claim and any deliberate body welcome into its councils, without one dissenting voice accepted that coinage plank.

I am reminded that I have heretofore voted on the line of this bill and am advised to be consistent. It is a sufficient answer that conditions have changed and I am now called on by my party to sacrifice my views for the general good.

During the same discussion Mr. Patterson, a Democratic member from Tennessee, citing the Democratic platform adopted by the State convention of Tennessee for 1892, which declared in favor of "a currency of gold, silver, and of paper, convertible into coin at the option of the holder," and then citing the currency plank of the national Democratic party, recently adopted at Chicago, and a portion of the letter of Grover Cleveland, dated February 10, 1898, said:

Mr. Speaker, I submit, in view of the nomination of Mr. Cleveland at Chicago and in view of these expressed declarations, that the national Democracy is not committed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, but, on the contrary, has expressly declared against the free coinage, except on the basis that every coin dollar, whether of silver or gold, shall be equal in intrinsic value of every other coin dollar. So far as I am concerned, I shall merge my individual judgment into the aggregate judgment of the party to which I belong, and I shall accept its latest deliverances as the guide for my action. [Applause on the Democratic side of the House.]

When the final vote came upon agreeing to the adoption of the rule for taking up the bill for discussion, it was defeated by a vote of 136 yeas to 154 nays.

There is one noticeable fact in connection with these discussions. Both Mr. BAILEY, the gentleman from Texas, and Mr. Bryan were members of that Congress, were both present during the discussions, but so far as I have been able to ascertain neither of these gentlemen uttered one single word in favor of the free-coinage bill.

When the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], during the last Congress, was emptying the vials of his wrath upon the devoted head of Mr. Cleveland, and exhausting his vocabulary of vituperation, he was in candor compelled to acknowledge that "when Cleveland was renominated in 1892, we knew he was against silver."

There can be no question that the parting of the ways between ex-President Cleveland and the Democratic party upon the financial question was not caused by his change of views. In 1892 the party was thoroughly in accord with him, and his views remained to the end of the Administration as they had been at the beginning.

What will be the Democratic position in 1900? Will it go back to Cleveland or remain for Bryan? Will it espouse free coinage, or will it declare for the gold standard, or will it declare for the coinage of a silver dollar of equal intrinsic value with that of gold at a ratio of about 40 to 1? It is fair to say that, whatever policy it advocates, it will be governed by the probabilities of success and for the purpose of obtaining votes, rather than for the purpose of establishing a principle.

But what are the principal arguments against this bill? They are the ones we have heard so often. Divested of rhetorical flourishes, they consist of three statements of alleged facts:

First. That since the so-called "crime of 1873" silver has been demonetized, its use as money discouraged and decreased in amount.

Second. That, owing to this alleged decrease in the use of silver, gold has been insufficient to answer the monetary needs of the world and has appreciated in value.

Third. That growing out of this imaginary hostile legislation against silver there has been a large decrease in the amount of money in use throughout the world, and especially in the United States, and that this has decreased the price of all classes of products.

Now let us see, briefly, what the actual facts are—facts that can be proved by record and are beyond dispute.

First, as to the United States. From the time the mints in the United States were opened in 1792 until the 12th day of February, 1873, a period of eighty years, the total coinage of all classes of silver money by the United States amounted to $135,782,360.70. This was an annual coinage of $1,697,279.50. Of the amount of silver thus coined annually, $8,081,230 was in dollar pieces and of full legal-tender value. Since the 12th day of February, 1873, until the last day of April, 1898, there had been coined in the mints of the United States of all classes of silver the sum of $589,630,990, or an annual coinage of $28,185,293.20. Of this, there was $431,933,742 in standard silver dollars of full legal-tender value. Thus, in twenty-five years since the "crime of 1873" we have coined more than four times the amount of silver that we coined in the eighty years prior to that time and fifteen times as much each year. The coinage of silver at the mints of the United States last year was $27,711,536.65. For the year 1873 the total amount of silver coined by the United States was $2,504,488.50, in round numbers—ten times as much per annum after as in the year before "the crime." In 1873 the entire amount of silver money in the United States of all classes was $3,150,000. Not one dollar of this was in standard dollars of full legal-tender value.

On the 1st day of December, 1899, the total amount of silver money in the United States amounted to $562,132,725. In addition to this there was silver bullion in the Treasury against which paper was issued and in circulation to the amount of $89,026,280, or a total amount of silver money of $657,159,005, or more than $100 of silver in 1899 to every dollar of silver in 1873. Of the amount of silver money in the United States in 1899, $371,648,656 was full legal tender for all debts, public and private, except otherwise specified in the contract.

Now let us see the conditions in the rest of the world. Accurate statistics for all of the world in 1873 are not obtainable, but we have accurate information as to the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Belgium, Netherlands, Austria-Hungary, Australasia, Denmark, and Sweden and Norway. These embrace the principal civilized countries of the earth. At that time the total stock of silver of these countries aggregated $1,037,685,000. These same countries on the 1st of January, 1898, had in circulation as silver $1,730,600,000. This was an increase of $720,915,000.

On the 1st day of January, 1895, the stock of silver money of the entire world was $4,070,500,000. On the 1st day of January, 1897, it was $4,286,300,000, or an increase in two years of $197,800,000.

This completely disposes of the claim that the world is using less silver than formerly. On the contrary, the increase of silver in the civilized world, and especially in the United States, has been much more rapid since 1873 than before that time. The greatest increase has been in countries where the gold standard is in full operation.

Now let us see as to the condition of gold. In 1873 the entire stock of gold in the United States was $135,000,000. The entire stock of gold in the United States on the 1st day of December, 1899, including gold bullion in the Treasury, against which certificates are issued, amounted to $1,015,940,462.

Now let us examine the rest of the world. The principal civilized countries of the world in 1873 possessed an entire stock of gold coin amounting to $1,309,800,000.

On January 1, 1899, these same countries possessed gold coin amounting to $4,631,700,000, more than three times the amount of gold coin in 1899 than they possessed in 1873.

In the whole civilized world in 1899 there was 96 per cent more gold than there was of both gold and silver in 1873.

In the United States alone we had over seven and a half times as much gold on December 1, 1899, as we had of both gold and silver in 1873. If we had no silver at all, we should have more than seven and a half times the amount of metallic money in 1899 that we had in 1873. No one pretends that the population has increased at any such rate.

In 1873 the total coinage of the United States of both gold and silver was $61,147,748.

In 1899 the coinage of the United States amounted to, in gold and silver, $135,918,766.68. In addition to that we sold to foreign countries in silver more than we imported, of the value of $25,534,787, or a total increase of metallic wealth, based upon our gold and silver productions in the year 1899, amounting to $161,453,553.65.

From 1870 to 1890 the annual average gold production of the entire world amounted to $115,000,000.

In 1899 careful estimates place it at $378,000,000, much more than double. In 1897 the world's production of gold exceeded by $99,000,000 the entire production of gold and silver in 1873.

It will be seen, therefore, that if all our silver money was destroyed the world would have much more metallic money in proportion to its population than in 1873. This is especially true of the United States.

Let us examine this claim of scarcity of money from another standpoint.

In 1860 the entire amount of money in the United States, including bank paper of uncertain value, amounted to $442,102,477.

In 1878 it was $762,221,575, the largest amount of money that had ever been in circulation in the United States at any one time.

On the 1st of December, 1899, the total amount of money in the United States of all kinds was $2,707,240,114.

In 1873 the thirteen principal countries above referred to possessed a total stock of money consisting of gold and silver amounting to $2,267,485,000.

In 1897 these same countries possessed a stock of gold and silver coin amounting to $5,570,300,000, more than double the amount possessed in 1873.

In 1873 the world's production of gold and silver was $179,000,000. In 1898 the world's production of gold and silver amounted to $501,144,000.

The price of products frequently fall because of increased power and invention. Bryan himself stated that accurately when he said:

You must attribute it to the inventive genius that has multiplied a thousand times, in many instances the strength of a single arm enabling us to do with 1 man what 80 men could not do fifty years ago. That is what has brought down prices in this country and everywhere.

Prices of agricultural products are affected by seasons of drought or plenty in this or other countries, by the condition of industry, increasing or diminishing demand. But the safest measure of the value of gold is human labor.

The supply of this is not greatly increased or diminished except as the demand increases or diminishes. The fact is undeniable and beyond dispute that, measured by human labor, the value of gold has diminished more than one-half since 1840. In other words, it will buy less than one-half the human labor it would buy in 1840. It will buy less than half the human labor it would buy in 1865—much less than it would purchase in 1873. It needs only to be added that practically the entire increase of the money of the world has been in the countries that maintain the gold standard. With the exception of Mexico, the amount of money in the silver-standard countries has remained practically stationary.

These figures show conclusively that the maintenance of the gold standard is in the interest of increase of money, not decrease. No silver-standard country has any gold in circulation as money. Every country that has free coinage of silver at any ratio is upon the silver standard. No silver-standard country, practically, maintains in circulation any paper money, while the value of silver is so completely changing, so often fluctuating.

the whole civilized world recognizes the value of maintaining the gold standard.

In 1892 Austria-Hungary adopted the gold standard. In 1873 India ceased to coin silver on private account, and is unquestionably about to adopt the gold standard. In 1895 the gold standard was adopted by Chile, and Russia, Japan, and Venezuela have adopted the gold standard. China is about to be partitioned among the nations of the earth who have adopted the gold standard. There is not a civilized country on the face of the earth, except Mexico, that has a monetary system not based upon the gold standard. It is the only money system that preserves the currency of a country from rapid fluctuation. A fluctuating currency endangers business, checks enterprise, ruins the weak for the benefit of the strong, who can take advantage of the change in markets to fill their own pockets. If the United States should not maintain the gold standard, it will stand alone among the civilized nations of the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, no haunting fear of possible embarrassment by reason of having former utterances of mine on the floor of the House on the subject of monetary standards hurled at me impels me at this time to make reference thereto, for I am satisfied that not one of the handful of budding statesmen who, manuscript in hand and nervous in anticipation of the effect upon themselves and their audience of the first sound of their voices in this Hall, who attended the session on the evening of February 7, 1896, has the slightest recollection of my maiden effort on that occasion.

The speech lies deep in the catacombs of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, from which deep interment gathering doubts in my mind of the mutual relationship of certain causes and effects therein accepted overcame the natural desire I might have had to resurrect and exhibit the rhetorical perfections of my Congressional firstborn. Hostile and unfriendly hands, however, dragged it from the oblivion in which I would have been content to have it rest and used garbled extracts as ammunition, through two campaigns, for both the siege guns and light artillery with which they assailed my political position. This fact, and the desire to be entirely frank with the House, alone overcomes my natural modesty in calling attention to former efforts. I have, however, no apologies to make for that speech, the central idea of which was embodied in the following sentence:

Not until each recurring sunrise shall find a debt, as measured by the human effort required to pay it, no greater than when the sun last set; not until the investment of capital in legitimate lines of human effort shall pay greater returns than capital locked up in safety vaults; not until the day shall come when the miser hoarding his coin wealth shall no longer profit by its daily, weekly, and monthly enhancement of value, shall this nation return to an era of true prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, that day has arrived and more, for each day since the passage of a Republican tariff bill and the assurance of a stable currency under a Republican Administration has lightened the burden of the debtor, increased the rewards of the producer, and offered new avenues for profitable investment. There was a time when I, in common with many others, believed that the highest good of our country and the world demanded an attempt to maintain a double standard of monetary value. I reasoned then somewhat in the light of the past, but more with the thought of escape from desperate and deplorable conditions then existing.

I reason now, I believe, more fully, comprehending all the lights and lessons of the past, including the immediate past, and in the clear and steady radiance of present conditions, with their bright illumination of a glorious future. The gentlemen on the other side with whom some of us have partially agreed on this question in the past assume to be surprised at the change which has taken place in the opinions of many. I confess to an unbounded astonishment, in face of the demonstrated fallacy of all of the fundamental propositions laid down in the past by the champions of unlimited silver coinage, that they still continue to advocate their old theories, and can only account for it on the ground of political expediency. With you some of us followed with sinking hearts and straining eyes the deepening twilight that marked the fading of the last day of the double standard and mourned its passing, for, though oft obscured and uncertain had been its light, it was the best that we had known. But, my friends, our eyes have seen the bright-robed heralds of the ruddy dawn precede the glowing chariot of the golden sun of a better, brighter, and more glorious day, while you still linger weeping at the empty tomb of a defunct theory whose spirit and essence has risen in a newer and more perfect form.

Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to express, in the form of a statute, what has been practically the monetary conditions for sixty-odd years, and unquestionably and beyond all controversy our practice and policy during the entire life of one generation of men. It rises above the vague and undefined terrors inspired by mysterious and meaningless catch phrases and with the splendid courage which has always characterized the Republican party writes upon the statute books the irrevocable decree of the eternal law of evolution. I have never understood what determined the choosing of the metal for the construction of the image of the infantile bovine before which the children of Israel worshiped while Moses lingered among the thunders of Sinai, but I have often thought how surprised those hard-hearted idolaters would have been could they have foreseen that their act was to be used by the silverites as a figure of speech to conjure with in the discussion of the currency question thirty-five hundred years after their sinful souls had been called to reward. Truly the evil which men do lives long after them.

No man has ever claimed, to my knowledge, that a double standard was the ideal condition, and no man who values his word will deny the statement that the two metals have never for any length of time circulated at a parity where there was free coinage for both. The only excuse for the effort to maintain a double standard has been the fear that there was not a sufficient amount of one metal in the world to answer all the purposes of a monetary standard. If there is a sufficient amount of gold in the world and shall continue to be in the future, then no man can deny the wisdom of maintaining a single standard or defend the stupendous folly of inviting the dangers and the disasters incident to the fluctuating relative values of a double standard. How are we able to decide whether there be gold enough to serve all purposes of a standard? If you believe in the quantitative theory of money, you find your answer in the trebled production of gold since 1873, while if the trend of the prices of products be your test, you have a practical answer and demonstration in the fact that in the face of cheapened methods of production under the gold standard the prices of commodities have risen and now stand at a figure which will yield the producer good returns for his labor.

In my opinion there is one test of the sufficiency of a monetary standard which transcends and outweighs all others; it is the test of its effect on the rewards of human toil and effort, and since men began to establish governments, since history's scroll first unrolled, there has never been a time when it has been recorded that human labor was so well rewarded as it is to-day in these United States and under this standard. It is astonishing with what assurance and alacrity the free-silver men have assumed in the past the mantle of prophecy and equally astonishing the composure with which they essay to continue the prophetic rôle in view of the utter failure of their past predictions. The consuming fires have persistently refused to descend in answer to their commands and appeals, while at the word of the Republican Elijah there arises the sweet savor of the sacrificial thank-offering of a happy, prosperous, and contented people. Need I remind the gentlemen on the other side of the just fate of false prophets and warn them to turn to the true monetary faith ere an outraged people whom they have deceived visit swift and condign judgment upon them?

Mr. Chairman, some of the gentlemen on the other side, greatly agitated over the effect of this legislation on the Republican party, clamorously insist that this measure is a step beyond any national declaration of our party, and point to our platform adopted at St. Louis in support of that contention. It is my opinion that the declaration made by the party at St. Louis, and upon which the party won a glorious victory, did not necessarily place us under the obligation to declare the gold standard by statute, but "God works in a mysterious way his wonders to perform," and we have another illustration of how the wrath of men may be turned to work out good ends, for the pledge we did not specifically give at St. Louis we have since given on the stump and in local platforms in answer to your declaration that we intended to fix and declare the gold standard. You threw down the guntlet; we accepted the challenge, and some of us have been surprised to find that our people have been more eager to accept it than we were.

During the entire period when a most earnest and zealous effort was being made by the Administration through the medium of a commission of able men of both parties friendly to the double standard, the opposition were discrediting the commission, and while praying for its failure, belittling its efforts. The commission failed to accomplish the purpose for which it was created, and with its failure multitudes of thoughtful men abandoned their faith in the possibility of the establishment of a double standard by international agreement, as they had already begun to doubt the efficacy of such an agreement, if entered into, to accomplish the objects sought.

Then came the campaign of 1898, the campaign which resulted in the issuance of commissions under which the members of this House are now serving their constituencies. The incidents of that campaign are still fresh in my memory. It began with lingering doubts in my mind as to the wisdom of finally fixing a single standard. The opposition insisted on a definite declaration and they received it. My constituency, men and women, have been considering this question carefully for years. I have never claimed a wisdom superior to theirs with regard to this question, which we all studied alike, but the challenge of the opposition cleared away all doubts on the subject.

I accepted the challenge and declared that, if in the wisdom of the Republican party the declaration which we now propose to write should be required to set at rest all doubts and dangers of disturbance of our financial system and divert the possibilities of the disasters of a debased coinage and fluctuating standard, it would receive my support and my vote, and my presence here indicates that my constituents indorsed that declaration. Mr. Chairman, the opposition, nervous lest we exceed the definite obligations of our commissions from the people, say that we have had no command from them to do this thing. As for myself, if there is any one thing above all others which I have a commission to do it is this, and my commission comes not from any class, not from any one condition in life, but from the majority of the people of my State, of all classes and conditions, and from no portion of our citizens is my commission so clear and unmistakable as from the wage-earners, for it was from the communities where they predominated that I received my largest majorities. They understand this question, and I stand as their representative to see that the dollars which they receive in payment for their toil shall be the best dollars in the wide world, sound, safe, and enduring in value.

Mr. Chairman, I favor the bill because it is the expression of an onward step in the march of monetary evolution, a definite statement that in the future there can be no doubt as to the value of our dollars anywhere or at any time, and that all of them, silver, paper, or gold, shall be equal in honor and value. There are some provisions of the bill relative to the redemption of our currency as to the necessity and wisdom of which I have some doubts, but as to these provisions, as they commend themselves to the judgment of the majority of my party, I accept them as perhaps the best solution of a somewhat difficult problem. With the passage of this bill the Republican party rounds out and completes the legislation necessary to fulfill its promises made to the American people for the restoration of confidence and prosperity which it begun by the passage of the Dingley tariff, and with the passage of this measure I look forward confidently to a continuation of the growth and development of our country and the betterment of the condition of all our people under the guidance of that great party whose enlightened and constructive policies have made us prosperous and contented beyond measure at home and respected and honored beyond precedent abroad. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I have always liked the Republican party because it has had the courage to stake its fortunes and its life upon its convictions. I do not expect this afternoon to indulge in a eulogium upon the Republican party. I do not believe that at this time anything I can say would aid to place it in a different position in the history of the country than that which it now occupies.

All nations, Mr. Chairman, have perpetuated or commemorated or celebrated some great act or achievement, some great life or act of courage. Englishmen, as we know, take special pride in recollecting Wellington and Waterloo and old Nelson and Trafalgar. As I understand it, in France, upon the highest pedestal of martial glory stands the figure of old Napoleon, looking out on the field of Austerlitz. It is said that the Greeks still celebrate Marathon and the sea fight of Salamis. We have linked, Mr. Chairman, in imperishable remembrance, the names of Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, with Vicksburg, Winchester, and the march to the sea.

But, Mr. Chairman, when the figure that shall typify or represent the greatest deed of the Republican party shall be molded and shall be put upon its pedestal, it will not look out on fields of battle, but rather it will look over that long, persistent, courageous fight which the Republican party has made through the years to maintain at the highest point our public credit and to preserve inviolate the nation's pledged faith.

I was entirely satisfied, Mr. Chairman, to leave this bill where the able and exhaustive explanation of my colleague on the committee [Mr. OVERSTREET] left it at the close of his speech, but since that time debate has taken a wide scope, and it has traveled away so far from the formulated propositions which are supposed to constitute the topic of this discussion that I think it would be well to imitate the wisdom of that ancient mariner referred to by Webster in his great speech and turn once before this debate closes to the subject-matter of this bill.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, in the brief time that I take to sum up and put upon the record my understanding of the purposes and provisions of this bill, and if I get outside of that it shall be wholly by reason of the fact that this debate has not been confined at all to the subject-matter that was supposed to have been the issue in the discussion. If this bill is passed, Mr. Chairman, and it comes up to the expectations of those who framed it, it will accomplish four things. In the first place, it will remove all doubt as to the standard of value by putting that standard in express terms in the gold dollar. In the second place, it will remove all doubt as to the kind of money in which the interest-bearing obligations and the demand notes of the Government are to be paid, by putting in express terms a provision that they are to be paid in the gold coin of the United States; and in the third place, it puts in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury means and machinery adequate to maintain the standard in the gold dollar and to pay the obligations that I have enumerated in gold, and to maintain on a parity and of equal value all the money issued and coined by the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it accomplishes what I have indicated, it will settle our monetary system upon a foundation so firm and enduring that no disturbance of financial wind or storm will ever shake it.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, at this point to indicate, not because I have any personal pride in this bill, not that I care whether its present form is adopted or another in order to make potential the ideas that we find crystallized in the terms of this bill, but I want to point out wherein it differs materially from any proposition that has heretofore been presented to this House.

The first important provision in section 2 of this bill is one that is clearly distinct from the provisions of the other bills that have been introduced in this House. The Indianapolis commission bill and the bill introduced by my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], and perhaps some other bills, provide that all obligations of the Government shall be paid in the gold coin of the United States.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I desire to justify the distinction between this bill, or this provision in this bill, and the provisions of other bills which relate to the payment or redemption of the obligations of the United States. This bill selects, first, the interest-bearing obligations of the United States; second, the United States notes, and third, the Treasury notes; and it makes these three classes of obligations—obligations that have been recognized by the Government for many years as gold obligations—and these alone, payable in the gold coin of the United States.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to justify the attitude of the committee on that important proposition. When we come to examine the Indianapolis commission bill and the Hill bill and other bills of like character we found that under the broad and sweeping provisions of these bills that the millions of dollars paid out upon obligations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the millions of dollars paid out to furnish supplies and munitions of war to the Army and Navy, the millions of dollars paid out for the purpose of paying the salaries of the officials of the Government, all of these amounting to many millions annually, by the terms of all these bills would be payable if demanded in the gold coin of the United States.

So this committee determined, Mr. Chairman, that it was wise to make a distinction, if we could make a distinction that was justified by practice and precedent, which would relieve the Government from the unnecessary and embarrassing burden of being compelled under form of law to pay every obligation of every kind and character in the gold coin of the United States.

So in this bill, and for the first time in the history of the legislation of this House, we formulate a law which agrees precisely with the practice of the Government, and which agrees in every particular with the promises that the Republican party frequently made during these years, that the interest-bearing obligations, the United States notes and the Treasury notes, should be paid in gold coin.

And then we distinguish between the obligations—we distinguished but did not discriminate between the interest-bearing obligations—United States notes and the Treasury notes and the great mass of other obligations, public and private, which did not desire to be paid in gold coin, but was satisfied with the money as good as gold, and we provide in this provision that all other obligations, public and private, shall be paid or performed in accordance with the standard established in section 1 of the bill.

It is clear, therefore, that thus far this bill is different from the other bills, but it differs in another particular, and has been criticized to some extent on that account. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] made a severe criticism on the bill, and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] made a kindly criticism upon it. The gentleman from New Jersey holds that the discretionary power to exchange gold for silver dollars or any other form of United States money in the division of issue and redemption relates back and makes the redemption of the demand notes discretionary. My friend makes this point, that by that provision, which leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out gold in exchange for silver, it relates back as a matter of construction to the provision that is mandatory in its terms, requiring him to pay gold for the redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes, and that the latter discretion makes the whole power discretionary.

I want to call attention to a rule of construction. I do not know that my friend is a lawyer, but I want to call his attention to a rule of construction recognized by the courts and the profession, and perhaps this rule of construction has misled my friend. It is that if in a later provision of an act the precise thing is made discretionary that in an earlier provision is made mandatory, by a rule of construction the entire power is left as a matter of discretion.

The application of this rule, Mr. Chairman, depends on the identity of the thing, the one that is made mandatory and the other made discretionary. In this bill the provision which requires the Secretary of the Treasury, upon demand of the holder, to pay out gold coin upon demand for United States notes or Treasury notes is a mandatory provision, and it is the operation legally or technically called "redemption."

The provision of the bill found later, and referred to by the gentleman, is an entirely different provision. It relates solely and entirely to that power that is exercised in the exchange of money, and the discretionary power is entirely distinct and separate from the power that he refers to in the earlier part of the bill.

But there is another provision of this bill to which I desire to call attention, and that is this: In the two provisions to which I have called attention, the first in section 2 of the bill and the other in the two sections following—sections 3 and 4—a means is provided, a means which has never been suggested in any other bill, so far as my recollection now serves me, for the purpose of maintaining and keeping this gold reserve to the point of safety and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold standard and the parity of all our money.

This bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power—and this may have appeared in some other bill, but it has not within my remembrance—the Secretary of the Treasury the power to draw upon the general fund down to a balance of $50,000,000 for the purpose of maintaining the gold reserve fund to the required amount. The other bills have provided several kinds of devices for that purpose, but not one of them, so far as I now recall, ever gave the Secretary of the Treasury any power to draw upon the general fund except in the creation and the organization or setting apart of the reserve fund. Under this provision, without being compelled to issue bonds, without being compelled in any way to pledge the credit of the Government, this reserve fund can be kept up and maintained simply by drawing out of the surplus of the general fund which may exist beyond and above a working balance of $50,000,000.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me for a moment?

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. He will find that in the bill reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and also in the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, by Mr. Mitchell, and prepared by Mr. Muhlenberg, of New York. Both bills contain that provision.

Mr. KERR. I say to my friend that he is entirely mistaken about that provision appearing in any bill unless it appears in the McCleary bill.

Mr. HILL. Perhaps if I read the language the gentleman will be satisfied that I am right.

Mr. KERR. I ask the gentleman to indicate what bill he refers to.

Mr. HILL. The bill reported unanimously by the ten Republican members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures at the close of the last session.

Mr. KERR. I will ask if that is the McCleary bill? That is the Hill bill, is it not?

Mr. HILL. That is the bill reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. KERR. And introduced by yourself?

Mr. HILL. Introduced by myself; and the same provision appears in the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported by Mr. Mitchell, of New York. The language is as follows:

And for this purpose he may from time to time transfer to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. KERR. Well, I was very sure, and I thought I had read all of these bills, but when the gentleman referred to this proposition I was not quite sure but that it appeared in the McCleary bill. The thing which I am referring to is the limitation to a balance of $50,000,000 in the general fund. I knew that that provision did not appear in the Hill bill, and I thought it did not appear in any other bill that had been considered by any committee of this House, unless it was the McCleary bill.

In the bill to which the gentleman refers the authority was conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury to draw upon the general fund without limitation, but this bill fixes exactly the boundaries of this power, providing that he must keep in the general fund enough money always to constitute a safe balance, but that beyond that he has the entire surplus revenues of this Government upon which to draw in order to maintain intact or to the extent provided by this bill this gold-reserve fund which was to make good at all times the redemption of United States notes and the Treasury notes.

But I call attention to another criticism that has been made upon this bill, Mr. Chairman. It has been said by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER], who is an expert upon this subject and whose criticisms were not very kindly, in my judgment, and it has also been said by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who is also an expert, and whose criticisms have been entirely kindly upon this bill, that it is fatally defective because it did not provide for the absolute and unconditional interchange or exchange of silver and gold at the Treasury.

Now, we had under consideration that proposition, and it was an exceedingly troublesome one. We had before us all the arguments of those gentlemen who have spent years in preparing to distinguish themselves in the positions they have occupied with honor for a good many years upon those committees which deal especially with this subject. But I have thought a good deal in accord with the opinion of my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who appointed the House committee in the last Congress. His idea was that men can become too wise upon these subjects [laughter], and when he appointed a committee of nonexperts, men who made no claim to special knowledge upon these subjects, he recognized the fact that men dealing too long with these subjects could so refine their knowledge as to be entirely incomprehensible to others and very largely incomprehensible to themselves. [Laughter.]

But the committee acted in the light of history and tested the arguments of these gentlemen of experience. The foundation of their argument for absolute exchangeability of gold for silver was that the declaration itself would make one as good as the other, and under such a condition one would not care to exchange. We looked to see if the declaration would of itself satisfy, and thus save the gold reserve from five hundred millions of silver. We recalled that the resumption act made greenbacks and gold or coin equal by providing that these notes would be redeemed in coin, and for years all were redeemed without trouble; but there came a time, in 1893, when the declaration did not satisfy. The people were not satisfied with the right to exchange greenbacks for gold—they took the gold. The declaration or provision in this bill making it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to pay gold for silver would only put the reserve fund, in such times as we had in 1893, in jeopardy by adding five hundred millions of silver to the United States Treasury notes or gold extractors.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I think the gentleman said my criticism upon the bill had been very kindly.

Mr. KERR. Very kindly.

Mr. HILL. I am sorry to say that the criticism that he has just made will not bear a similar construction.

Mr. KERR. I was about to say that from that criticism I excluded the gentleman from Connecticut. I believe his knowledge has been utilized; and it never has reached the point of refinement where it has become useless. I can not say so much in regard to other gentlemen who have sought to criticize this bill. I want to say to the gentleman that in my judgment the ablest speech delivered in this House was by the gentleman from Connecticut, in which he not only paid a compliment to this bill, but he illuminated with his knowledge and his great intellect this entire subject. [Laughter and applause.]

I call attention, Mr. Chairman, to another thing. I have now called attention to about all I desire to mention that may be said to be the distinguishing features of this bill—features that make it distinct from other bills introduced here. I think the committee is entitled to some credit for having done that which no other committee of this House has been able to do, namely, report a bill and have it agreed upon by the Republican membership.

Mr. HILL. I wish the gentleman would be correct. The Committee on Coinage, by unanimous vote of the Republican members of that committee, did report a comprehensive bill at the last session.

Mr. KERR. That is the bill introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut. But it seemed that the House—and I have the greatest reverence for the gentleman's knowledge, and a good deal of it was crystallized in this bill—yet this House, either from lack of inclination or time (this side of the House, I mean), never has been able to join with the gentleman and say that it is a proper bill to take up and present to the country.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. It seems to me that a little unwritten history of the House of Representatives could be given at this time.

Mr. KERR. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. HILL. I will take time before the debate on this bill is concluded to give it, in view of the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. KERR. I have none but the kindest feelings for the gentleman from Connecticut. I believe him to have knowledge superior to that of anybody with whom I have had the opportunity of discussing this question. I have not had the opportunity to discuss the question with everybody, but I think his knowledge is superior and his comprehension of the subject is wider than that of any other person that I have had the pleasure and opportunity to talk with upon this subject.

Mr. HILL. Taffy is cheap.

Mr. KERR. I want to call the attention to some criticisms that have been made by gentlemen on the other side. The other day, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], one of the ablest men on the other side, made a speech in the opening of this discussion, there came up some question as to what General Jackson thought or did and about the question of the standard.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, all that General Jackson thought upon this subject; I do not know all that he did upon this subject; but I do know, however, that he recognized a fact that refutes every argument made on the Democratic side during the last three years. He recognized the fact that the two metals, gold and silver, would not circulate as money concurrently at a ratio substantially different from the ratio of their intrinsic value; and he made that opinion potential by signing the act of 1834, which carved out of the gold eagle enough grains of gold to reduce its intrinsic value to the intrinsic value of ten silver dollars; and when he did that he made an argument that has answered every argument that has been made by the Democratic party since it has been intent on fastening upon the country silver as standard money.

Now, I think, Mr. Chairman, that our Democratic friends would do well to recur more frequently than they do to the teachings of General Jackson, not only upon the subject of finance and money, but upon the more general subject of patriotism. In his day, Mr. Chairman, the flag of his country was never assailed, either at home or abroad, either upon the land or the sea, that he was not somewhere about its standard helping to bear it onward and upward to victory; and if General Jackson was living to-day he would be a Republican upon all the great principles and upon all the great propositions that now divide the two parties of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He was in favor of a protective tariff, and you have abandoned Jackson not only upon that proposition, but upon the money question. You have forgotten Pierce and Polk; you have been trying to forget, for these many years, Buchanan; you have discarded and disowned Cleveland; you have extinguished all the beacon lights and upon a sea that is unmarked and unsounded you are searching for a harbor that you will never find.

If you will let me change the figure now from off the sea to the land; if you were starting a political pantheon you would be absolutely bankrupt. You have not a single political god until you reach Jefferson, three-quarters of a century in his honored grave at Monticello. But the Republican party has enough heroes to make a hundred political pantheons. It has a history that blazes and will blaze on to the end of time in the great temple of American liberty.

As I said when I started, I believe in the Republican party, because in a good many desperate situations, when public sentiment seemed to be running against it, it had the courage—the courage of its convictions—to stand always without a sign of wavering for everything that would raise higher the public credit and that would contribute to the maintenance and preservation of the national faith.

Mr. Chairman, I want to put in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an editorial that appeared in the New York World two or three days ago. The heading of it is, "The triumph of a sound idea." I desire, without reading any more of it, to print it as a part of my remarks. I understand the World is good Democratic authority.

THE TRIUMPH OF A SOUND IDEA.

The unanimous indorsement of a gold-standard bill by the House Republican caucus is fraught with far-reaching consequences. It means that the bill will pass the House on the day set for the vote—Monday of next week. It means, furthermore, that whatever differences there may be with the Senate on other details of a currency bill, the essential principles of both bills—sound money and an unquestioned national faith—will be adopted and approved by the President.

This unanimous agreement is extraordinary in view of the unsoundness and timidity in the Republican party on this question down almost to the present year. Not so very long ago Mr. McKinley was advocating free silver; and the various forms of the financial craze that have prevailed during the last thirty years—the "rag baby," unlimited paper money, the "paying" of bonds in irredeemable greenbacks, and, finally, free silver at 16 to 1—have found strong support among the Republicans of the West. It is probably true, as Mr. RICHARDSON, the Democratic leader, said in the House on Friday, that if the proposition to reaffirm the gold standard had been made in the House three years ago "half the Republican side would have been up in arms against it."

Yet such has been the irresistible advance of a sound idea, and the inevitable decay of an unsound idea because it is unsound, that to-day the Republican party in Congress is united in support of a measure to reenact the existing gold standard, to declare that all interest-bearing obligations and all United States notes shall be redeemed in gold, and to give to the Secretary of the Treasury what is now lacking—explicit authority to maintain the gold reserve for redemption purposes.

In taking this position, under the encouragement of the march of events, and particularly of the Iowa election, the Republicans have displayed courage, capacity, and foresightedness. The time is ripe for a settlement of the question that has menaced business and disturbed politics for thirty years. And it is not surprising that several of the Democratic Congressmen of this State refuse to be drawn or driven any further in even tacit support of the fatal fallacy of "free silver." The Democracy of those honest-money Democrats—Jefferson, Jackson, Benton, and Tilden—is the only Democracy that can save and restore the party.

In addition to that, for the purpose of showing what the Republican newspapers have said about this bill, I desire that a portion, which I will indicate, of an editorial that appeared in the New York Press be published as a part of my remarks:

This is the sort of direct, uncompromising lawgiving on moot points that makes great parties and great nations.

"Sec. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1860, shall be redeemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section."

All the fruits of twenty-two years' incessant warfare since silver fiat was substituted for paper fiat as an adulterate injection into the currency are secured to the nation by these few courageous lines.

Now, about all I want to say in addition, Mr. Chairman, is upon this proposition, that the time has arrived, and I think we have delayed a long time, when we should settle this question of the standard of value, and we should determine once for all in what coin or money these obligations which have been denominated coin obligations should be paid.

Now, the necessity of this may somewhat lie in Republican legislation, but it lies more largely in the declarations and the attitude of the Democratic party upon these propositions. The trouble, of course, occurred, and it is so familiar history that I am hardly inclined to refer to it. It occurred in the public-credit act of 1869, and later in the resumption act of 1875, where the word "coin" was used in reference to the money in which the bonds should be paid and the greenbacks should be redeemed.

Now, I charge, and I do it without any purpose to be offensive or without any purpose to apply it personally, that the Democratic party has never omitted an opportunity, whether it intended it that way or not, to do that which would impair the public credit and reflect doubt and uncertainty upon the nation's faith and obligations.

It commenced during the war, and by the discredit it cast upon the greenbacks reduced them in value millions of dollars. After they were issued and after that question was settled they then, in 1868, in the national convention of that year, demanded that the Government bonds, which at that time contained no certain stipulation as to the kind of money in which they were to be paid, should be paid in greenbacks, and that was the occasion of the great act I have referred to, called the public credit act, in 1869, which removed all doubts upon that subject by providing that these obligations should be paid in coin.

The necessity for the public credit act of 1869 lay in the declaration of the Democratic platform of 1868 that the bonds should be paid in greenbacks. The proposition was extremely dangerous and the argument in support of it was extremely seductive. They said the greenbacks have been good enough to pay the soldier for his valor; they have been good enough to pay the workman for his toil, the farmer for his wheat, and the merchant for his goods, and are they not now good enough to pay the bloated bondholder for his bonds? It took a courageous party to stand in the face of that argument. But with that supreme faith which has always characterized the Republican party in the ultimate justice of public opinion, it declared the bonds payable in coin.

They then propose that the greenbacks should never be redeemed. We did that proposed act of repudiation to death by the resumption act.

For sixteen years thereafter no considerable party organization made any direct attack upon the nation's honor. In 1896 the Democratic party again proposed repudiation in the demand that the bonds be paid and the demand notes be redeemed in silver. We propose to kill that off by this act.

I have always been interested in and have been able, in a measure at least, to comprehend the monetary arguments of my Democratic friends. But these gentlemen who lead and constitute the silver party have so refined their knowledge that they have got entirely beyond my comprehension. I shall not, therefore, undertake to penetrate the mysteries of their profound science. I desire, however, to notice a proposition or two advanced by the gentlemen who dominate the other side of the House.

I take as a starting point the speech of that able and subdued gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DE ARMOND. I take it, however, in connection with a speech he made in the Fifty-fourth Congress, prior to the campaign of 1896. In this latter speech he conjured up an invisible and intangible creature—what he called the "money power." That power, he said, had fastened upon the world the gold standard—that it fastened upon the world the gold standard to thereby reduce the volume of money and thereby reduce prices and thereby command a greater amount of the goods and property of the world.

In his speech the other day I discovered that this same invisible creature still lived, but that it had changed its name and occupation.

He styles it a "trust" now, and declares that it is now engaged in putting up prices, so, I suppose, its money will buy less of the property and goods of the world.

My Democratic friends ought to determine among themselves whether the money power is putting prices up or down before they set up to enlighten the country.

Gentlemen who had spent many months and much of God's pure atmosphere in telling the people that under the gold standard the volume of money would constantly decrease and prices constantly shrink are now attempting to get out of a most ridiculous embarrassment by saying, "Why, we told you that prices and business depended upon the volume of money, and with the increasing and increase of gold prices raised and business increased, just as we told you."

That escape, if escape it is, is complimentary to your ingenuity, but your knowledge suffers.

How did this gold get out and here? Gold has no legs or power of locomotion; it keeps no carriage; it has no private car; it even has not a pass upon the railroad. It came here on the rising tides and currents of business and commerce. It came across on steamships to pay for the products of American shops and factories. It came from the pockets of workmen who work in these shops and factories.

Mr. Chairman, even if we could we can no longer remain insular, wide as our boundaries are. I believe, as firmly as I believe anything, that the nation's destiny and duty was marked in the plan of the universe from the beginning. In that regard I believe a good deal in the old Presbyterian doctrine of foreordination.

Have you thought that for nearly six thousand or six thousand million years this great domain, the richest of all of God's temporal gifts to humanity, lay waste before it was the habitation of civilization, and then the civilization that was to take root and grow was selected by Providence or the providence of events? I believe this heritage was saved for the Anglo-Saxon. At least, Latin civilization found no soil in which it could strike its roots, nor atmosphere that it could breathe.

Nearly every royal power of Europe sought possessions here before Great Britain. Ponce De Leon, old in years and infirmities, came for the Spanish Crown, but instead of seeking possessions, he sought the waters of perpetual youth amid the vines and the flowers of the Floridas. De Soto came upon the same mission, landed upon the Atlantic coast, penetrated to the Mississippi, only to find a grave beneath the rolling tide of that mighty river. The seed was being prepared by the alchemy of civilization on the other side. When it was ready, the hand of the Almighty gathered it and sowed it.

As an eloquent gentleman once said on this floor years ago, "When the seed was gathered, it came from the worn and broken crew of the Mayflower, from the ruined bands of Raleigh, from the free communities of the fallow land, and from the companionship of William Penn."

We must take our place among the great nations of the earth, and we can not do this unless we add to our industrial supremacy the supremacy of the seas; we can not do this unless we have a sound money system. No nation has ever made great progress in international trade and business without a money system in which the world had confidence. England has planted Anglo-Saxon civilization from Plymouth Rock to the Indies around the world; her flag floats upon merchant ships upon every billow of the sea, but for three-quarters of a century her money system has been above doubt or question.

I am not in favor of territorial conquest further than we have already "conquered." I believe we should first eliminate our monetary weaknesses and then start upon a conquest of shipping and commerce that will have no limits save the ends of the earth.

On the other side of the western ocean are 500,000,000 people just emerging from barbarism. Civilization will multiply their desires and their wants a thousandfold. There is not a commercial nation in the world save ourselves whose merchant vessels are not headed toward the Orient. Why stand we here idle? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Chairman, as this seems to be Kentucky day on this floor, I desire to say a few things about the passage of the pending bill, not that I desire to enter into a discussion of its merits to any great length, because I regard the financial crisis as having passed and the fleeting beauties of free silver forever gone. [Applause on the Republican side.] But referring to what occurred between my distinguished colleagues on the other side this morning, I desire to say that I knew that the Democratic party in Kentucky had been defeated and routed, but I had not suspected that a guerrilla warfare, growing out of that contest, would be transferred here and fought out on the floor of this House between the contestants from that party. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But since it relieves the situation in Kentucky and gives my people a rest at home, I am entirely willing that the fight should go on. [Laughter.] I have no desire to take sides with either gentleman. As between them, I am willing to admit that one is just as bad as the other says he is. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But in so far as the remarks of the gentleman from the First district [Mr. WHEELER] relate in an uncomplimentary way to the election of General Taylor, I desire to enter my protest. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he alleged that General Taylor had been elected by fraud and rascality.

Mr. Chairman, that statement is absolutely untrue, and comes in exceedingly bad taste from Mr. Goebel or from his representative upon this floor. Why, the election was held in Kentucky under a law that Mr. Goebel himself had passed for the benefit of his own party. I wish I had time to explain that law to you, and especially the methods by which that law was enacted in Kentucky. I shall content myself, however, with pleading it as a set-off; as a counterclaim against all the complaint of the other side; against what they have been pleased to term the ironclad rules adopted for the government of this body.

That law took the whole election machinery out of the hands of the people of Kentucky and placed it in the legislature. The law authorizes the appointment of three Democratic State commissioners, who hold the election. They hand down power to the county commissioners, who hold the elections and report back to their masters. They exercise all the functions authorized to be exercised by the coordinate departments of this Government. They held their election. They certified the results, and it goes to the honor of the State commissioners that two of them against one decided that General Taylor and the Republican ticket were elected. I say it must be humiliating to Mr. Goebel now to appeal from the decision of his own election board appointed under his own law. I deny and denounce as untrue the statement that General Taylor is elected by fraud or by rascality.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I see that the McKinley prosperity has been so manifest all over the country, and especially in the State of Iowa, that the other day when I introduced myself to the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. HEPBURN], he took it for granted that because I introduced myself as a Kentuckian I was a Democrat, and he referred me to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] when I asked him for a little time in which to discuss this question. [Laughter.]

Out there in Iowa they are so busy building barns and loaning money that they have no time to notice the political revolution which has been going on in Kentucky. Kentucky is the first State in this Union, and, so far as I know, the only State, that ever made the financial question a distinctive issue in a State campaign. Kentucky is the only State in this Union in which the Republican party ascended to power and has maintained itself in power upon a single gold standard. Kentucky is the only State in this Union in which the Democratic party, after it had held away for a quarter of a century, lost power when it departed from the financial views of Thomas Jefferson and adopted the free-silver heresies of William Jennings Bryan.

In 1895 the Democratic party in Kentucky indorsed the national platform upon which Mr. Cleveland was nominated, a platform construed by him and generally regarded by the country as indorsing sound money. Upon that platform a free-coinage ticket was nominated in Kentucky. General Hardin, their candidate for governor, promptly renounced and repudiated the platform upon which he was nominated and declared for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Governor Bradley, the Republican candidate, promptly declared for the gold standard and construed the platform upon which he was nominated to mean the gold standard, nothing more and nothing less. The campaign was fought out upon that issue, and the Republican party won their first victory by a majority of nearly 10,000.

In 1896 the issue was the gold standard on the one side and the free and unlimited coinage of silver on the other. This question was debated in every schoolhouse and in every family in Kentucky, and the verdict of the sovereign voters of Kentucky was for McKinley and sound money. Yet the sound-money Democratic ticket received a very respectable vote. Then came Mr. Goebel upon the scene. Yes, he came because he was not born in Kentucky. The man who originated the Goebel election law was not born in Kentucky. The soil that gave birth to Abraham Lincoln did not give birth to Mr. Goebel. Then came the election to which we have referred, and the people of Kentucky again elected the Republican ticket upon a sound-money platform.

Why, the gentleman from the Third district of Kentucky [Mr. RHEA] said this morning that no man who was contending for the passage of this bill had ever smelt fresh earth. I do not know any two districts in Kentucky where the people have plowed and hoed more corn than the one that I represent and the one that he represents, and I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that both his district and mine voted for sound money and General Taylor at the last election. [Applause on the Republican side.] My district gave nearly 17,000 majority for the Republican ticket, and his district gave a good respectable majority for the Republican ticket. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from the First district [Mr. WHEELER] and the gentleman from the Sixth district [Mr. BERRY] are not the only two gentlemen in Kentucky who must look out.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the time has passed when you can take anything for granted in Kentucky. The Democrats have to put the straightedge to a number of their former leaders to ascertain the stage of their political orthodoxy. The distinguished and gifted editor of the Courier-Journal, whose talent and ability all Kentuckians admire, who used to write the platforms and shape the policies of his party in the State and nation, now has to take his bearings in order to determine his own political status.

I congratulate the committee that prepared this bill for coming to Kentucky for sound financial ideas, and I trust the time may soon come when the country will look to Kentucky for its President. We gave it the best President it has ever had, the typical American and the great man of the nineteenth century. Mr. Lincoln stands for all in the nineteenth century that Frederick the Great, Napoleon Bonaparte, and George Washington stood for in the eighteenth century.

I have learned one thing during the progress of this debate—that there is one advantage in being a new member. While he goes foot on the committees and is expected to have but little to say in the shaping of the legislation of the country, neither side of the House can have any amusement at his expense by commenting upon the apparent inconsistencies of his record, connecting him with the unfortunate legislation that has befallen the country. But, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I am disposed to throw the broad mantle of charity over the mistakes of the statesmen on both sides of this House, for the country has outlived and, I trust, by the passage of this bill, will be able to outgrow the effects of all the bad legislation that has come to it from both parties.

I believe, sir, that the country will ultimately profit by all the legislative experiments of Congress on the silver question between the years 1873 and 1893, as it has profited and will continue to profit by its experience with the tariff legislation enacted by the Democratic Congress known as the Wilson bill. By reason of what has occurred in the past, we will the more easily in the future detect fallacy in logic and sophistry in argument, and will the more readily discover the pitfalls that lie in the pathway of the nation's progress. I predict, Mr. Chairman, that it will be a long time before the Republican party will again fool with silver or the Democratic party tinker with the tariff legislation.

The unit and standard of value and the parity of our currency have been before the country for discussion so long that the enlightening power of the press, the schoolhouse, and the statesmen has so thoroughly informed the people and educated the public mind that this debate is a mere formality, wanting in spirit and interest.

I am for the passage of this bill because it recognizes the true theory of money. If the doctrine of fiat money is sound, then all taxation is unjust, oppressive, and wrong, because, if the Government can make money by legal enactment, when it needs money it ought to make it and not tax the people to get it. If the doctrine of fiat money is good, then Mr. Cleveland did wrong when he issued and sold $260,000,000 worth of bonds to get money to run the country until a Republican Congress could be elected to repeal the only legislation that the Democratic party has given the country for a period of nearly forty years. If the law can not make money all fiat it can not make money one-half fiat, and Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton were right when they declined to read the acts of Parliament and Congress to ascertain the legal value, but went into the markets of the world to ascertain the commercial value of gold and silver in 1792, when the first mint was established in the United States.

Congress may put a statute behind a dollar that will give it a debt-paying power but not a purchasing power. You may compel a man to take a cheap dollar for a debt, but you can not compel him to take it for his property. The statute can not carry the debt-paying power of a dollar any further than the statute itself reaches. I conclude, therefore, that money is a commodity and has a commodity value; that there is 100 cents' worth of credit in every greenback dollar, and there is about 50 cents' worth of credit in a silver dollar, and there is no credit in a gold dollar. Its commodity value and its money value are the same, and it is, therefore, the most suitable substance for a standard of value and has been so recognized by the leading civilized nations of the world.

I am for the pending measure because it proposes to do that to which the country is already committed, to keep on a parity our ten different forms of money. The Republican party is the only party in this country that has been able to maintain this parity. Their success lies in the fact that they have acted honest with their creditors. Their record is a guarantee to the business world that they will continue to pay their obligations in the best money, their creditors being the judges. Our credit to-day stands first among the civilized nations of the world, and we can no more afford to back down from our position on finances than we can afford to haul down the American flag from where the valor of our soldiers and the achievements of our Navy have planted it.

I am for this measure because it will tend to increase the volume of our currency without impairing its efficiency; it authorizes the national banks to issue currency to the face value of their bonds. This ought always to have been the law. If the Government sells these bonds at face value, it ought to allow the banks to issue currency to the amount of the face value. The shifting of the Government tax from the currency to the franchise of the banks is another wise provision, because it will encourage the banks to buy more bonds and issue more currency when the business interests of the country demand it.

The only criticism I would make on this provision is that, in my opinion, it would have been better to make the franchise tax go to the capital stock alone. The franchise tax upon the surplus and undivided profits will have the tendency to make the country banks grow weak instead of strong, because it offers an inducement to the stockholders and directors to pay out, in dividends, the earnings of the bank rather than to add to the surplus fund. This, however, was so small a matter in comparison to the great benefits that I believed would result from the passage of this bill that I felt, in caucus, entirely willing to keep my hands off the bill if my Republican colleagues would do the same.

I am for the passage of the pending measure because it authorizes the organization of national banks in the smaller towns with $25,000 capital. In my judgment, this will be a great advantage to the South and West. The towns of 2,000 inhabitants and less will organize national instead of State and private banks.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House have had much to say in the way of pleasantry, criticism, and crimination upon the Republican legislation and the Republican administration of public affairs. A few of them, however, seem to have spoken wiser than they knew.

The gentleman from Virginia said that the Republican policy of paying our obligations in gold that had been contracted to be paid in coin was our Old Testament and the pending measure was our New Testament, and charged us, therefore, with insincerity and inconsistency. If the gentleman has read either the Old or the New Testament to any purpose, he must know that the New Testament is infolded in the Old, and the Old Testament is unfolded in the New. The pending bill, in so far as it relates to the standard and parity of money, is infolded in the custom of this country, and this custom will be unfolded in the pending bill when enacted into law. We will then do according to law just what we are now doing according to custom. The gentleman's logic therefore sustains our contention.

It has been also alleged that the pending bill has been enacted in the interest of trusts. In response to that I beg to call attention to the fact that the Republican party is the only party in this country that has ever gone on record in its legislative acts in favor of regulating trusts. I regard the pending bill as being wisely and conservatively drawn, laying the foundation upon which we can construct a financial system that will enable us to maintain our standing before the civilized world in finance, as we stand in civilization.

I have been a single-standard man since 1873 and shall cast my vote for the passage of this bill, knowing full well that my action in so doing will be approved by my party and my people. And I can truthfully say, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party is the only political organization in Kentucky that now stands for civil liberty and an honest dollar. [Applause.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time allotted to me I would not, if I could, attempt to analyze the provisions of this bill, and I could not, if I would, add anything to the clear and explicit statements that have been made by the gentleman from Indiana and other members from this side. I rise, however, as a Representative of a community vitally interested in its passage, a community whose banks are among the most conservative in the country, whose business men are among the most prosperous in all the land, whose manufacturers find a market all over the earth and in certain lines lead the world; of a community in which there is a large German population whose political faith has been, "There is but one political god for us, and that is the Republican party, and John Sherman is its prophet;" of a farming community also outside of the city of Cincinnati, made up of as intelligent and progressive a population as is to be found in the country; a population which has never gone astray after greenbackism, fiatism, Bryanism, Jonesism, or any other ism; and I convey to you their hearty indorsement of this measure.

Gentlemen on the Democratic side derisively ask, "Where is the prosperity that was promised when McKinley was nominated, and when did it begin?" The student of the weather has a means of knowing its changes long before they occur. When the storm center is passing over the land, while the clouds still lower and the rain falls and the wind blows, the tiny stream of mercury in his barometer begins to climb, and he knows the storm is passing and the sunshine coming. So the business interests of the country are a great political barometer which forecasts the changes to depression or prosperity long in advance of their coming. The political barometer, which had almost sunk out of sight during the last year of Cleveland's Administration, began to rise with the nomination of McKinley, and in July and August preceding his election had almost reached its normal condition. It has continued rising ever since, and is to-day still indicating a continuance of the prosperous condition which it forecasted three years ago. If that stream of prosperity to which Harrison alluded ran bank full in 1892, it has since 1896 crossed its banks and swept over the country as with a mighty flood. Gentlemen who say they can not see evidences of this prosperity must indeed live in a God-forsaken part of the United States if they do not see it at their own homes. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

But if they do not see it there and want to see it, I invite them down to the district which I have the honor to represent. There they will see the skies darkened by day by the clouds of smoke going up from the factories and lighted by night by the fires from the furnaces and the lights from the workshops running twenty-four hours of the day with extra shifts of hands. There I will show them the streets and depots clogged with the manufactured goods which they produce on their way to and waiting for the trains, to be carried and distributed all over the earth. They will see the streets emptied of idleness and filled with the rush of business. They will see the soup houses closed and the workshops open. Let them go with me to the farmers of my county and they will find abundant crops bringing profitable prices and their farms freed from the mortgages with which they were burdened during the Democratic Administration. They would be blind indeed could they not see these evidences of an actual, existing prosperity, and what they would find in my district they would find duplicated and repeated in nearly every other Congressional district in the country. But none are so blind as those who will not see, and I fear that some of our Democratic brethren belong to that class referred to in the Scriptures who having eyes see not and having ears hear not; neither do they understand.

There are four distinct and prominent provisions in this bill.

First. The establishment of the gold standard by law;

Second. The creation of a redemption division of the Treasury Department as distinct from its fiscal division;

Third. The permission to banks to issue circulation to the full amount of their security; and Fourth. The authority to establish banks with a capital stock of only $25,000.

The establishment of the gold standard by law is nothing more than putting into practicable operation the declaration of our platform and the uniform practice of our party in the past. Upon that issue we went before the country and were successful in the last Presidential campaign. We are but keeping our plighted faith with the American people in establishing this principle upon a foundation which can not be shaken by political changes. We are placing a barrier in the way of any future President or Secretary of the Treasury, by a mere declaration of policy, throwing the country upon a silver basis. When we enact this provision into law we give stability to our credit and confidence in the sincerity of our obligations.

The establishment of a redemption division and the requirement that our demand and other obligations payable in gold by this act shall not be withdrawn from the Treasury for the purpose of raising its gold reserve, unless upon the presentation of gold itself for their withdrawal, will prevent a repetition of the endless chain by which unscrupulous bankers and brokers, for their personal profit and advantage, weakened the credit of the nation, cost the country millions of dollars, and created a panic.

The permission to banks to issue to the full amount of their security is but a declaration that the bonds which the bank has deposited for its circulation shall no longer be discredited by their makers; that their Government will no longer say that its promise to pay a hundred cents on the dollar of its bonded debt shall only be accepted by it as safe security for 90 cents on the dollar. Not only is it a wise provision from this standpoint, but it is expedient as a business proposition in that, in connection with the reduction of the tax upon the banks, it will encourage the issue of additional bank notes and the increase of circulation to meet the varying demands of business. At the same time it gives that elasticity of the currency which is absolutely requisite to prevent stagnation. If more money is needed, the banks can increase their circulation to the full amount of their securities. If less is needed, they can withdraw a portion of their circulation and thus, from time to time, can meet the varying demands of trade.

The establishment of banks with smaller capital will not probably in my district lead to the creation of a single additional bank. We have now perhaps as ample facilities in that line as are needed. But we recognize the fact that there is a tendency to congestion in all the large banking centers of the country and depletion of money in the remoter portions of our country. This provision will to a great extent remedy that evil, and will enable every community to secure the necessary moneys for handling and moving its crops, and at the same time increase the general circulation in the country at large.

My attention has been called by an eminent financier, who has given a great deal of attention to this subject, to a slight inaccuracy of language in sections 3 and 4 of this bill, and I wish to call attention to it now instead of waiting until to-morrow, when the bill is being considered for amendment, in order that the committee may decide whether or not it should be amended in the following manner:

Amend section 3 by inserting, after the word "exchange," on line 15, page 2, the following words: "of the notes and certificates and of the exchange;" and also amend section 4 by striking out, in line 13, page 4, the words "issued or;" and inserting, after the word "coined," the words "or notes or certificates issued."

I do not know that I can more forcibly state the reasons for the desirability of these amendments than by using the language of the gentleman to whom I have referred (Col. D. W. McClung, of Cincinnati), and which I quote, as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, December 8, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I have read—somewhat hurriedly, it is true—both the currency bills now before Congress. They are both in the right direction and a long stride toward permanent conditions.

But in both of them I notice an objectionable use of the word "money." Such phrases as "money coined or issued by the Government" occur. Money is not issued, and notes are not coined. They ought to be distinguished by the terms used. Money and notes ought not to be used as synonymous or convertible terms. Language abhors synonyms, and correct use of language requires that words be used in their strict sense.

In the hurry of the exchange and the tumult of ordinary speech colloquialisms, slang, abbreviations, misnomers, and all other barbarities are tolerated.

But surely in the high and solemn speech of a national enactment the terms used should rise to the great argument. The statutes of the United States should be a model of precise and unmistakable expression. And there is a much stronger reason for discrimination in the matter under discussion than decorous and exact use of words. To admit that notes are money is flat greenbackery. To use words with this implication is to give countenance to the fatuous falsities that have cursed us for a generation. Every man who has been required to discuss the "money question" before an American audience intelligently has been compelled to make this distinction, argue it, illustrate it, enforce it, namely, that notes are evidence of debt and must be paid and that money is final payment and needs no redeemer. Men can not think sanely without making this distinction and following it to the end. If Congress now enacts a law giving sanction to this confusing use of terms, I expect as long as I live to have it flung in my face by those who claim that paper is money and the Government stamp is a creative power.

Furthermore, it is of the highest ethical importance that these terms, "money" and "notes," be carefully discriminated and used with all the rigor of applied science. The moral obligation to pay notes has been our sheet anchor in holding the people to sound money. You perhaps know that hundreds of times I have stood face to face with home audiences and argued this question. I know what argument tells. If we now concede that notes are money, we lose our impregnable position.

I know that lexicographers as a secondary definition make notes or any other currency to be money. This is in deference to common usage. I know, too, that another definition is "anything that is wealth or valuable property." But these concessions to common speech are not law in drawing an instrument in which the distinction is vital.

Can you not call attention to this matter in some quarter where it will be effective?

Very truly, yours,

D. W. McCLUNG.

HON. JACOB H. BROWELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I wish for my own information, and possibly for that of others of the House to whom the point may have suggested itself, to inquire as to what provision is contemplated for taking care of the demand and other obligations of the Government which shall be in the hands of the Treasury Department at the time this act shall go into effect. The bill provides for the transfer to the redemption division of the gold coin and bullion held against outstanding gold certificates, the amount of United States notes held against outstanding currency certificates, the amount of silver dollars held against outstanding silver certificates, the amount of silver dollars and silver bullion held against outstanding Treasury notes of the act of 1890, and of gold coin and bullion for a reserve equal to 25 per cent of the United States notes and Treasury notes under the act of 1890 outstanding.

I see by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that on this day there are gold certificates in the Treasury to the amount of nearly $30,000,000, silver certificates in the Treasury to the amount of over six millions, currency certificates to the amount of $770,000. Are these obligations to be retained in the Treasury Department and used for its fiscal obligations and in the payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government? Are they to be destroyed and wiped out of existence, or are they to be transferred to the redemption division and there held subject to withdrawal in the same manner as other obligations which are to be hereafter presented? I see no provision in the bill which will answer this question and would like to have an explanation from the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. KERR, if he will be kind enough to give it.

Mr. KERR. The law now provides that they are destroyed when taken into the Treasury on redemption—not only the Treasury notes when redeemed in silver, but the currency certificates when redeemed in currency and the gold certificates when redeemed in gold.

Mr. BROMWELL. The answer of the gentleman is, I assume, correct, but it may be a question as to whether some definite statement to that effect ought not to have been incorporated in the bill itself.

And now, gentlemen, as to the expediency of passing this bill at this time. Surely there never could be a more opportune moment than this for carrying out the pledges made by the Republican party and placing our financial standing upon a firm basis. With a Republican President and a sufficient Republican majority in both Houses of Congress, we can make no excuse that we are unable to legislate upon this important question.

The country will hold us responsible for the promises we have made and demand their fulfillment at our hands. The balance of trade is in our favor and will continue to be for months to come. Our revenues are ample, not only for our current expenses, including the cost of a great war, but to furnish a surplus which, up to the present time, equals for this fiscal year over $16,000,000 and will at its close, it is estimated, amount to over forty millions. Manufactures and business were never so prosperous and confidence in our financial stability never greater than at the present time. Surely no combination of fortuitous circumstances could ever be expected to occur in the future which would give us greater confidence in trying this experiment, an experiment which, like those of the exact sciences, will amount to a mathematical and scientific demonstration of our wisdom.

It has been the pleasure of some members on the Democratic side to twit Republican members upon their apparent change of views in regard to the money question and to say that we have abandoned the positions we assumed in former sessions of this body. Were this charge true, it could be completely answered by the mere statement of the fact that wise men sometimes change their minds, but fools never. If it be the boast of the Democratic party, as represented on this floor, that it learns no wisdom from experience, that it can not be convinced of the error of its ways, and that even if convinced it persists in its error, the gentlemen are welcome to that position. But, as has been well said in this debate, the Republican party is a party of progression, is ready to admit that it is not omniscient, being only human, not divine, and that if it makes mistakes it is willing candidly to acknowledge them and readily to correct them. The gentlemen have referred to the votes of this side of the House in refusing to insert the gold clause in the bonds issued in the Cleveland Administration. I was one of those in the Fifty-third Congress who refused to do so. For that vote I have neither apology nor excuse. I was then as much as now in favor of a single gold standard, but I did not propose by my vote to cast any doubt or uncertainty upon the meaning of the word coin as contained in previous obligations of the Government. I believed then, as I believe now, that the word coin meant gold and that unless all the Government obligations could be declared payable in gold at that time, it would cast doubt upon and discredit previously issued bonds.

I, too, joined in the vote in favor of an attempt to secure the coinage of silver upon the same basis as gold by international agreement. I did not believe such an agreement could be reached, but I was willing to try the experiment because I believed, and still believe, that although even with such an agreement much embarrassment would be experienced in maintaining the double standard, even with the concurrence of all other great nations, it might be possible to find a market for years to come for the silver production of the country. I see nothing inconsistent in my present position and in my former vote on these two propositions.

This bill will pass without a dissenting Republican vote, and I am glad to know that it will have support from the other side of the House. When the war of the rebellion broke out, there were many patriotic Democrats who did not hesitate to break their party affiliations, take up their guns and swords, and march with Republicans to the defense of the country's flag. There were many equally patriotic Democrats who in 1896 left their party to march again, shoulder to shoulder, with sound-money Republicans in defense of their country's financial honor, and I am glad to see that there are to-day a number of gentlemen on that side of the House, small in numbers though they be, who are willing to rise above their party and join interests with us in promoting the future stability and success of our financial standing in the eyes of our own people and in the eyes of the world. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to my colleague from Texas, Mr. BALL, as he may desire.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, having had the privilege on yesterday of discussing this bill, my purpose now is simply to give notice that before the vote is taken I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the enacting clause of this indefensible measure. It is so objectionable in its every provision that no antidotes in the shape of amendments could perfect the bill or extract its poison. Without trespassing further upon the time of the House now, I desire to place in the RECORD some specific objections to the bill, that they may be considered in connection with my remarks on yesterday.

First. This bill is intended to and does completely demonetize silver, destroys in effect the legal-tender function of silver, abandons the use of nearly one-half our redemption money as such, and permanently commits this country to the single gold standard.

Second. It is a complete sell-out of our Government and people to the bondholders, national banks, and creditor classes, in that it makes all debts, public and private, heretofore and hereafter contracted, which are now payable in coin or lawful money of the United States, payable in gold. As the bankers offered to take the sixty-two and one-half millions of coin bonds issued by Mr. Cleveland, if made payable in gold, at an interest rate which would have saved $16,000,000—a proposition against which nearly every prominent Republican then voted—some idea can thus be formed of the enormous bonus to be reaped by the holders of United States bonds by this provision. Certainly it will amount to nearly $200,000,000. This sum is but a bagatelle compared to the harvest provided for the holders of other debts, of which there is accounted for in this country, in round numbers, $20,000,000,000. Private debts not estimated therein will certainly double that amount.

Third. The three hundred and forty-six millions of greenbacks, now at par for having, so many years served us, are to be impounded in the Treasury when received and only paid out for gold, not reissued as by law now required.

Fourth. The division of redemption provided for will retire from circulation a large percentage of the money now available for business.

Fifth. The silver dollars and silver certificates as well as the coin certificates now outstanding, representing more than half our circulation, become simply a demand gold debt due by the Government, as they are made redeemable in gold by this bill.

Sixth. The privileges of the national banks are inexcusably and consciencelessly extended. They are permitted to organize small banks in small towns, while the larger banks are relieved by its provision from competition in the cities, small banks being prohibited. By reducing the tax now levied the national banks now organized are given $1,000,000 per annum of taxes heretofore paid by them.

Seventh. The bill abandons the right to issue paper money by the Government, and surrenders to the banks that power. As the coinage of silver, except for change, has been already stopped, the power to contract or expand the circulation is thus vested in the money-lending class as their interests suggest, regardless of the rights or necessities of their debtors.

Eighth. The power to issue gold bonds in war or peace is vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, and the discretion of that bankers' agent is the only limitation upon the amount to be issued.

Had such a measure been admittedly the policy of the Republicans in 1896, Mr. McKinley would not now be President.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this bill and the reasons which have been offered in support of it exemplify the readiness of our Republican friends to abandon their own positions and to adopt the argument of their opponents. I remember that three years ago, when one of the most talented men that ever occupied a seat in this Hall, toward the conclusion of one of the most splendid speeches ever delivered on this floor, exclaimed that "the Republican party has not yet declared in favor of a single gold standard," he was interrupted by many voices on that side declaring, "And it never will." The RECORD shows that "Mr. Hardy and others" responded to Mr. Towne's declaration that "the Republican party had not yet declared in favor of a gold standard" with the confident exclamation, "And it never will." If it had been Mr. Hardy alone, I would not attempt to hold the Republican party responsible for his utterance. But it was more than Mr. Hardy, and it was more than any one or two men. If it had been only one other, the reporters of the House would have said "Mr. Hardy and Mr. —." Had there been two or three, they might have recorded the names of all of the interrupters; but with a fidelity to the truth which does honor to the gentlemen who serve us in the capacity of reporters they recorded the interruption as by "Mr. Hardy and others," because those speaking were so numerous they could not enumerate them all.

I am aware that it does not embarrass my friends across the aisle to be reminded of these things. I have witnessed the absolute indifference with which they hear our accusations of inconsistency. They declare that they are ready to change their position whenever they change their minds, and that declaration does credit to their moral and political courage; but it is not creditable to their wisdom that they so frequently take a position one year which they are compelled to abandon the next year. I honor them for being ready to change whenever they are convinced that they are wrong, but I am not willing to trust them in face of the fact that they find it necessary so often to repudiate their most solemn declarations. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The fact of it is, Mr. Chairman, that our Republican friends have always been so busy studying the trend of events that they have never found time to study the money question as a science. They know just as much about it—and they know no more—to-day than they knew four years ago, which was, and is nothing at all. They study events; they do not study principles. They have long since accepted the shallow drivel, which some men miscall a maxim, that statesmanship is the science of circumstances, and circumstances can not change more rapidly than they can. But, after conceding them all of the credit which they deserve for their eagerness to keep pace with the progress of public sentiment, I shall demonstrate, before I conclude what I desire to say, that they have taken advantage of what they conceive to be a change in public sentiment upon the coinage question to incorporate in this bill a totally different and indefensible proposition. Even if its coinage provisions are correct, it does not follow that its banking provisions are sound.

If I can have the attention of the House, I shall divide this bill into two parts and discuss each as a separate measure. It is intended by the first section of it to establish the gold standard. But, gentlemen of the majority, do you not know that the gold standard has long been established by the law of this country? Have you forgotten, or do you imagine that you deceive the people with your phraseology, that the coinage act of 1873, which, it is fair to assume, every member of Congress has read and re-read, solemnly declares that the gold dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of standard gold is our "unit of value?" That is the law to-day. Why, then, is it necessary to enact it a second time? You were so anxious to make the people imagine that you were proposing something new that you have absolutely committed the absurdity of describing the unit of value as a part of something else. Your bill declares "that the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle." It is a new form of expression to describe a standard as a fraction of something else when the correct way to express it would be to describe something else as a dividend or a multiple of your standard. But you are so eager to make the people believe that you were doing something new and wise that you would write an absurdity like that upon the statute books of your country.

Gentlemen, if you know that the gold standard is at present established by law, for what purpose did you seek to establish it again? I have read of making "assurance double sure," but I thought that was merely the poet's license of expression; and I never supposed that sensible men commissioned to represent a great and free people in the House of Representatives would attempt to reduce the poet's license of expression to a legislative practice. Do you fear the present law is not strong enough, and will you make it stronger? It is not that; but it is because you are seeking to embarrass many members of this House by compelling them to vote against what they conceive to be the instructions of their people or else help you to establish your banking system. I shall attempt to prove that even a Gold-standard Democrat can not justify himself in voting for this bill, for whatever may be his judgment upon the question of a standard he violates every principle and tradition of our party when he votes in favor of a bill under which the Government establishes a standard and turns the absolute control of our circulation over to the national banks. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Our friends on the other side seem to think that they have completely answered our objections to the gold standard when they point to the existing good times, and the burden of every speech on that side has been that the prosperity of to-day refutes the arguments which we made in 1896. Let us examine that question for a moment and see how much weight that method of argumentation ought to possess with intelligent people. Let us recall what the issue and the arguments were then and compare them with the conditions which exist to-day. In 1896 the Democratic party affirmed that the annual increase in the production of gold was not sufficient to meet the increasing demands for gold, and that therefore the value of it was constantly enhancing. We contended, further, that as the value of gold enhanced the price of all commodities measured in gold necessarily decreased, and affirmed that this was an injury to the country. Our friends on the other side declared first that the low prices which then prevailed bore no relation to the supply of money, and then affirmed that an elevation of prices produced by an increase in the volume of money would seriously injure the country. Three years have elapsed since then, and, while they have materially changed conditions, they have not affected the validity of our argument or yours. Indeed, these three years have afforded the people an opportunity to judge between your wisdom and ours.

In 1895, the year before we made the arguments which you are now assailing with such vehemence and such a show of confidence, the world produced in gold and silver $307,000,000, and we declared that the whole amount was needed to meet the world's increasing need for money and to satisfy the industrial demands against those two metals. You said that was not true and contended that the supply of gold alone was ample. But throughout this debate, and without an exception on that side, we find you now rejoicing in the enormously increased production of gold. Answer me upon your candor, gentlemen of the Republican party, if the one hundred and seventy million dollars' worth of gold which the world was producing in 1895 was sufficient to meet the world's increased demands for gold, why it is that you are rejoicing now because the production of gold has almost doubled? Do not these good times, which you ascribe in large part to the enormously increased production of gold, instead of refuting our argument confirm it? [Applause on the Democratic side.] We demanded that the mints of our country should be opened to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver, to absorb, if necessary, the world's entire annual supply of $307,000,000. To-day the accidents of mining have produced almost as much gold as the world was then producing of both gold and silver; and yet, not one of you will dare to tell the people of this country that the three hundred millions of gold which the world produces is more than the world requires. If over three hundred millions of gold is not more than the world needs now, how will you answer our argument made in 1896, that the $307,000,000 of gold and silver combined was not more than the world required? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen on the other side have spoken as if our position requires us to deny the effect of the great and sudden increase in the production of gold; but nothing could be further from the truth. Indeed, the reverse of this is true. We do not deny that the increased production of gold has mitigated the distressing tendency toward falling prices; we go further even than that, and we assert that it has resulted in a slight elevation of prices. This does not conflict with anything that we have ever said; but, on the contrary, it establishes our contention both as to the cause of falling prices and as to the effect of rising prices. If attributed to the discovery of gold, the present rise of prices proves that we were right in connecting the low price of commodities with the insufficient supply of money; and the prosperity which has followed this advance in prices proves that we were also right when we declared that low prices make hard times and that good prices would make good times. What we said would happen if our mints were opened to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver, you say has happened under the free and unlimited coinage of gold alone; but you can not conceal the important fact that the production of gold alone is now as great as the production of both gold and silver then. It seems to me that the very results which you so exultingly ascribe to the discovery of these new and richer mines proves conclusively that we were right in 1896 when we asserted that the world needed more basic money. But even if we were mistaken in that, and whether the increase of prices has come through the increased production of gold or through some other cause, are you not ready to admit that we were right when we declared that an increase in the price of all commodities would be a blessing to the people of this land and that you were wrong when you denied it?

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman hold that the increase in the production of gold of which he speaks has dispensed with the necessity for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I do not.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman still thinks that silver ought to be coined at the mints at the ratio of 16 to 1?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I do. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] I will say this to the gentleman from Pennsylvania: If the world could not only continue but could increase the production of gold until it was equal to the sum of $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 a year, then you would dispose of our demand for the free coinage of silver by supplying sufficient gold for basic money. Our position on this question has been not the result of any prejudice against gold or any preference for silver. We do not love silver because it is white nor do we hate gold because it is yellow. We desire to use both, because we believe that both are necessary to constitute a sufficient supply of real money. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Give us that supply of gold and you dispense with the necessity for the free coinage of silver; but that simply fulfills our arguments and it does not refute them.

I warn the gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, that he is about to incorporate in the records of this House the same false prophecies that were made in the years which have passed and gone. When gold was discovered in Australia and California the world was advised that only one of the precious metals ought to be used for money; and, true to their instincts in favor of scarce money, and therefore what President McKinley has called "high money," they sought to demonetize the more plentiful and therefore the cheaper metal. When the commissioner of the United States to the Paris conference, Mr. Ruggles, urged the demonetization of silver, he predicted that the United States alone, before the close of this century, would be producing $500,000,000 of gold and silver. It has so happened in the history of the world that every time some new and rich gold or silver field has been discovered straightway the advocates of scarce and high money rise up to prophesy that the production will go on forever. When I heard the distinguished gentleman from Ohio read from the great French economist, Chevalier, I was tempted to ask him if that author did not predict, following the discovery of gold in California and Australia, that those mines would produce so abundantly and continue so long that they would deluge the world with cheap money. He was not alone in that prediction. All the men who belong to his school of thought expressed the same opinion.

My immediate concern, however, is not with prophecy, but is with the question of cause and effect. If it shall transpire that the world continues enormously to increase its production of gold, then it will happen that the gold mines will provide a sufficient supply to meet the world's increasing needs for gold, and will thus reverse the disastrous tendency to falling prices. It could not be, however, that the increase in the production of gold during the past three years could of itself and alone have produced the elevation of prices and the stimulation of business which we witness in this country to-day. That it has exerted an appreciable influence in both directions is unquestionably true; and that if it can be continued through a series of years it will exert a still greater and more beneficial influence is equally true, unless the demands for gold shall increase at a corresponding rate. But, gentlemen, if when the world is given an experience of rising prices coming from a more abundant supply of money for the next few years and then if in the providence of God these mines should be exhausted, or if by the industries of men the demand should be multiplied until the increased supply is more than absorbed by new demands, you will have found arguments in this experience beyond the power of your most skilled logicians to refute. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let the world understand how much better the times are under rising prices than under falling prices, and all the sophistries you can invent will not save you from the enlightened judgment of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen are altogether mistaken in asserting that the present rise in prices is due mainly to the increase in the production of gold. The increase in the price of wheat, which began in the fall of 1896 and has continued in a greater or less degree ever since, was largely due, as every intelligent man knows, to crop failures in the other wheat-producing countries of the world; the war with Spain added largely to the demand, and therefore to the price, of many articles; and the trusts, protected by a high tariff from foreign competition, have arbitrarily put up the price of their goods. We have also heard much about the increase in the price of cattle; but when our Republican friends claim credit for that they forget that the statistics show that in 1897 the people of the United States found themselves with ten million less cattle than they had in 1893. Not only so, but Australia had suffered the most prolonged and the severest drought that has visited any region in fifty years. It swept that great country bare of vegetation and withdrew it from competition with us in the meat markets of the world. With the shortage in our own country of more than ten million cattle, together with the shortage in Australia, is it surprising that the price of cattle should have risen during the past three years.

The question of price is a complex one. There are many factors, or rather, to be accurate, I should say there are two factors, entering into it; but each of these factors is subject to many influences. These factors are, first, the commodity whose price we seek to express; second, the money in which we must express the price of all commodities; and both factors are absolutely controlled by the great law of supply and demand. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], when embarrassed a day or two ago by some question as to the present rise in the price of cotton, replied to one of our friends on this side by saying that only a few years ago we denied that the law of supply and demand regulated the price of cotton and other commodities. The gentleman wholly misunderstood our argument. He has never done us the honor to read our speeches. The least intelligent Democrat in this country has never denied the operation of the law of supply and demand. On the contrary, sir, we are the only men who have maintained steadily and at all times the universal application of that law. The difference between us and the gentlemen on the other side is simply this: They apply the law of supply and demand to commodities and there they stop, while we apply it to commodities and money. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We say that it is as true of money as it is of cotton; that the more of it there is the less it is worth, and the less of it there is the more it is worth. When we seek to explain a change in price we look first to the commodity itself, and if we find that there has been no great change in the relations of its supply and demand, we then turn to the money for an explanation.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I will.

Mr. LACEY. I only ask the question to understand your position. Heretofore I understood that the claim was made that the supply of basic money, not money generally, will influence prices.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. There is no money but basic money. Everything else is simply a promise to pay money or a token. Of course, you must assume that when men undertake to discuss the money question they are not discussing the question of credit. I do not complain, assume of our friends do, about your obvious purpose to eventually withdraw the silver dollars from circulation. If the principle of this bill is correct, then the silver dollars ought to be retired; but that ought to be done by selling them as bullion in the open markets and not by locking them up as idle capital in the Treasury vaults. If you believe in your gold-standard doctrine, you ought to do with our silver, except the subsidiary coins, just as Germany did with her silver when she established her financial system on a gold basis. You ought to sell it for what it will bring in the open market, and you will do so just as soon as you think the people will permit you. The limited coinage of silver under a gold standard is not a question of money at all; it is simply a question of credit, and it can not possibly affect the prices of commodities any more than the issuance of so much paper. The advantage of paper over both gold and silver in point of convenience is universally recognized, and everyone knows how much cheaper it will be for us to print paper than it is to coin silver. Why, then, should we be required to use the less convenient and more costly silver, rather than the more convenient and less costly paper, when both are mere promises to pay gold.

I do not mean to say that this Government can make as good money out of paper as it can out of silver. I have not said that, and I do not believe it. I do not belong to that school which teaches that the law can create something out of nothing, and I have no sympathy with fiatism. But I do say and I do believe that this Government can make just as good a promise-to-pay money out of paper as it can out of silver, and can make it a great deal cheaper and more convenient for use. Unless silver can be coined on equal terms with gold and, like gold, left to stand upon its own value, there ought never to be another silver dollar coined in the history of this Republic, for it is a waste of the resources of the land to send men into the bowels of the earth to dig out its precious metals to be coined into promises to pay, when a substance equally as good for such a purpose can be obtained by the expenditure of infinitely less time and labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if you had the courage of your convictions—that is, if you have any convictions on this question [laughter]—you would take these silver dollars and sell them in the open markets of the world for whatever they would bring. To this you will come, unless—and I see my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who has as much wisdom and more courage than his Republican associates, nods his head in assent. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. If this bill passes, then, striking down silver as basic money, prices ought to be reduced one-half, ought they not?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Silver is not basic money now. The gentleman understands that, does he not? If he does not understand it, his lack of knowledge is a good excuse for supporting this bill. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that I am an old-fashioned Democrat; and I do not believe that anything which is a promise to pay, or which must be kept at a parity with the standard coin by limiting its amount and making it receivable in dues to the Government, is money at all. It is a mere substitute for money. The existence of it, however, is an admission before the world that there is not enough of basic money and therefore we must use a substitute. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Silver will be retired, and you will thus contract the currency—mark the distinction when I say you will thus contract the currency—unless you authorize your favored national banks to make up the difference with their notes. I am tempted in this connection to discuss the effect of currency on prices, a question which I think is widely misunderstood; but as that more properly falls within the banking features of this bill, I will reserve it until I reach them, while I now return to a consideration of the law of supply and demand which I was about to discuss when interrupted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

It is true that many prices are higher now than they were three years ago, but that does not go back far enough. You must explain to me why it is, if we have gold enough in this country now, that the prices of all commodities are to-day less than half as much as they were when this advance in the value of gold first began in 1873. Some of our friends occasionally make the mistake of asserting that we begin this comparison at 1873 because that was the year in which you passed the law establishing the gold standard; but that is not the reason. We begin with 1873 because that is the year when the separation between gold and commodities began, and marks, according to our theory, the beginning of the rise in the value of gold or, according to your theory, the beginning of the overproduction of commodities. Whether you are right or we are right upon that question, it still must be correct to begin with 1873 to trace whatever causes have operated to produce the change in prices. Beginning with the year of 1873, let us take those great commodities whose prices can not be influenced by the formation or control of trusts, such as cotton and wheat. They are higher now than they were two years ago, and yet they are not as high as they were the day that William McKinley was elected President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What will explain the present difference in the prices of cotton and wheat as compared with their prices in 1873? You say that cotton is worth less than 8 cents in gold to-day as against 16 cents in gold in 1873, because the world has enormously increased its production of cotton. That the production of cotton has been greatly increased I grant you, but my admission calls for one upon your part. You must admit, if you are candid and well informed, that while the world has greatly increased its production of cotton, it has also greatly increased its consumption of it, until the consumption of cotton to-day as compared with the production of it is as great or greater than it was in 1873; and therefore whatever alteration in the price of it may have taken place could not be due to the law of supply and demand as it has operated upon cotton itself. There has been practically no change in the relation of its supply and demand, and consequently there could have been no change of price on that account. Where, then, will you look for an explanation of the fall in its price? You can not look to the cotton itself, and you must look—

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Will you explain to this House how it was that in the five years from 1842 to 1847 the price was lower than it was in the five years from 1893 to 1898?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. It was, as Professor Jevons, an accomplished and ardent gold-standard advocate, has explained, because, owing to an insufficient supply of the precious metals, the value of money increased 145 per cent from 1809 to 1849 [great applause on the Democratic side], and all commodities fell in the same proportion. Then came the great gold discoveries in Australia and California, followed immediately by a rise in the price of cotton and all other commodities. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Cotton is the best of all articles for my present purpose of comparison, as it is the one article that can be traced from its production to consumption better than all others, because every pound of it that affects the price of it goes into the markets of the world, and a record of it is kept. Now, I challenge you to tell me why it is, if the relations between the supply and demand of and for cotton to-day as compared with 1873 are practically unchanged, that the price of it to-day is less than 8 cents in gold as compared with a price of 16 cents in gold in 1873. Gentlemen, do you know that the surplus cotton in the markets of the world at the close of this cotton year will not only be a smaller per cent of the total crop, but that it will be a smaller number of bales than the surplus that remained on the markets at the close of the cotton year of 1872-73? This conclusively demonstrates that the consumption of cotton has increased more rapidly than the production because it shows that the entire production has been consumed and the accumulated surplus has been treasured upon. How, then, can you explain the enormous fall in its price? There is but one explanation, and that is that the gold in which you measure the price has become twice as valuable to-day as it was in 1873. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why? Simply and only because the demand for gold has been increasing for twenty-five years more rapidly than the supply of it, and consequently the value of it has been rising.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one more question?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. How much basic money had we in 1873?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. The gentleman from Iowa must know that the value of gold and silver is determined by the supply of them throughout the world as compared with the demand for them throughout the world; and while we had practically no gold and silver in 1873, as specie payments had not been resumed, still the price of cotton, as I have given it, was the gold price.

I am now going to give the gentlemen from the West, who are doubtless more familiar with wheat than they are with cotton, an example to solve. The average price of wheat at the farms of the United States for the year ending at 1873 was $1.24 a bushel. The price of wheat last year on the farms of the United States averaged less than 81 cents a bushel. How will you explain this? Some gentlemen with more readiness than wisdom will doubtless say it is because we only produced 230,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1872 as against 530,000,000 bushels in 1898. That is only half the truth, for while it is true that our production of wheat had a little more than doubled, it is also true that we had doubled our population to consume wheat. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore, there could have been no change in the supply and demand for wheat to explain this enormous fall of over 35 per cent in the price. Instead of the change of price being explained, as some men attempt, by referring to the foreign demand, that aggravates the burden of your explanation; for while the increase in the domestic demand for wheat has kept pace with the increase in the supply of it, the foreign demand for it has more than doubled. The wheat exported to satisfy the foreign demand in 1872 was less than 17 per cent of the crop, while in 1898 we exported over 40 per cent of the crop. Thus driven from your home market into foreign lands, for an explanation you are confronted there with a condition which calls for increase rather than a fall in the price. Then, gentlemen, with a domestic demand as compared with the present supply as great as it was in 1872 and with the foreign demand as compared with the supply more than twice as great as it was in 1872, tell me why it is that the price of wheat is less by 35 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The law of supply and demand, as it operated on wheat, called for an increase in price, but instead of an increased price meeting an increased demand we actually find a fall in price of over 35 per cent. Where will you seek an explanation? There is but one, and that is that the law of supply and demand as it operated upon the value of the gold in which you express the price of wheat has enormously enhanced in value.

A friend who sits near me informs me that my time will soon expire. I had intended—

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I will.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I understand that taking the price of wheat each day for thirty years, between 1860 and 1890, the average price by decades shows that there was a difference of a very few cents during those years. It strikes me that that would be a very much fairer way to compare the matter.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Well, in the first place, I very emphatically deny the accuracy of that statement, because not in the last fifteen years has the price of wheat averaged within 30 cents of the price of 1872.

Mr. SOUTHARD. If I recollect correctly, the editor of a paper published in Dubuque, Iowa, has published a statement giving the figures—

Mr. HILL. I have the statement here. Wheat in 1882 was $1.10.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I think I could better employ my time, but I will hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Texas has stated that wheat was not so high in twenty years as it was in 1873. I have the record that in 1873 it was a dollar and in 1883 it was $1.10.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. That is a mistake. In 1873 it was $1.24 at the farms in the United States; and your 1881 price was the Chicago price. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. That is a statement easy to make; but my price is the price in Dubuque, Iowa.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. That is worse still! The Dubuque price would be the Chicago price minus the freight to Chicago if they produced more than the local demand called for, and plus the freight if they produced less. No fair conclusion could be formed by considering the price in a purely local market.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I can not yield for further statement. This is very interesting, Mr. Chairman; and if they will agree to let me conclude my argument, I will stand here until midnight and answer such questions as that. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

A circumstance which has contributed most largely to the business activity of the last three years, and which has been entirely overlooked by gentlemen on the other side, is the fact that many purchases which under ordinary circumstances would have been made in 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896 have been made in 1897, 1898, and 1899. This has happened in this way: The low price of farm products in 1893, 1894, and 1895 rendered our farmers unable to provide for anything except the most urgent necessities, and every article which possibly could be dispensed with was left in the manufacturer's warehouse or upon the merchant's shelf. For the lack of patronage the merchant could not patronize the manufacturer, and an almost unprecedented stagnation of business ensued. With the better prices which prevailed in 1897, 1898, and 1899 all this was changed, and the farmers not only found themselves able to provide for their current necessities and comforts, but they also found themselves able to make purchases and improvements which had been needed for years, but which had been postponed for the lack of means. When the exchanges which, under normal conditions, would have covered six years were crowded into the last three years, the necessary result was a greatly increased activity in all lines. Particular illustrations of this phenomena are within my personal knowledge, as they are within the knowledge of every gentleman on this floor. I have in my mind now an extensive cattle owner who determined in 1898 to subdivide his large pasture and supply each of the subdivisions with wells and windmills. He did not attempt, however, to execute his purpose under the low price of cattle which then prevailed, but immediately after the advance he made the improvements which he desired to make and which under normal conditions he would have made in 1893.

It is, Mr. Chairman, almost impossible to overestimate the extent to which cases like this have contributed to the revival of business for which the Republican party now so loudly claims the credit; and if Republican leaders were wise enough to look beyond the present, they would understand that with the return of low prices the old condition of stagnation will renew itself. Perhaps the men who now control the destiny of the Republican party are foolish enough to suppose that prices will not fall, and I sincerely hope that they will not; but much as I hope they will not I know they will, and I know too that when they do fall there will come an ebb in this tide of prosperity. That may happen next year in time to exert a decisive influence upon the Presidential election, or it may not happen so soon. It will happen, however, whenever the wheat and cotton crops of the world are normal both in this and in other countries. Notwithstanding the fact that the wheat crop of the world has been short for three years, and the surplus has almost been exhausted, still, sir, if the crop of next year should be above an average throughout the world the price of wheat will fall again to 50 cents at the farms of the United States; and whenever the cotton crop of the United States shall exceed 12,000,000 bales, with an average crop in the other cotton-growing countries, the Southern planter will be compelled again to accept 5 cents a pound for his cotton.

Whenever the purchasing power of the wheat growers in the West, and of the cotton planters in the South, is measured by 50-cent wheat and 5-cent cotton, then, sir, you will witness a misery which will again extend from our agricultural sections to the industrial centers of this land. The farmers constitute nearly one-half of those who must buy and consume manufactured goods, and whenever their purchases diminish the effect is immediately felt in every manufacturing and commercial establishment within the Union. Under the operation of a new and infamous system it may happen that the trusts will be able to maintain their prices; but if that shall be true, the one certain result will be to injure everybody except those who control the trusts, and the chief sufferers, next to the farmers, will be the laborers who work in the factories. It must never be forgotten by any man who seeks to comprehend this question that the income of every man limits his purchasing power, and he is a valuable customer or otherwise, according as his income is large or small. When wheat is worth 80 cents a bushel and cotton is worth 8 cents a pound the farmers in the West and South are liberal patrons of the manufacturers in the North and East. But when the prices of wheat and cotton shrink the people who produce them must correspondingly curtail their purchases, and thus while the farmers miss the comforts of a better income, the manufacturer suffers a serious loss of custom.

If manufacturers, by combinations among themselves, can keep up the prices of their commodities, it must of necessity ensue that the farmer will buy less in value in consequence of his diminished income, and he must also buy still less in quantity in consequence of the higher prices which he must pay for the trust-made articles. If this be true, and it does not seem to me that any rational man can doubt it, then upon the very face of it any man can discern the mischief which it brings at last to the men who labor in these great industrial enterprises. If the factories sell less goods, then fewer goods must be produced and fewer men are needed to produce them; and the sum of it all must be that thousands of industrious men will be denied employment. The wage-earner will become an idle citizen, and thus in his turn add to those who want but can not buy.

Gentlemen, we do not envy you the prosperity which the people now enjoy, and we fervently pray that it will continue with them through all the years to come. The Democratic party does not live upon the misfortunes of our country, nor does it die when plenty is scattered over a smiling land. We rejoice to see its crops abundant, though we grieve to see our own abundant crops coincident with crop failures and famine in other regions of the earth. And yet we are selfish enough to thank God, if He must scourge any of His children and bless others, that the blessings have come to us while the scourges have fallen upon our brothers in other quarters of the globe. While we grieve with the teeming millions that starve and die in India and in Russia, we would not deny to the American farmers the benefit of the increased price of wheat that came to him in consequence of the misfortune of an alien and inferior people. Nor do we complain that accidental discoveries have almost doubled the production of gold. If a remorseless and unrelenting Republican majority will not relieve the people by opening our mints to the free coinage of both gold and silver, we rejoice that human greed has found new mines to provide a more abundant gold supply. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If you imagine that this season of prosperity, which is due to causes wholly apart from politics, will destroy the Democratic party, you deceive yourselves. It has outlived panics under its own administration. It has outlived prosperous eras when its enemies administered the Government. It has outlived the rage and fury of a civil war. It has passed through the cruel days of reconstruction, and it will survive the taunts and jeers with which you now assail it. I am still a young man; yet I have seen it solemnly proposed to disband the Democratic party. In 1872 the Democrats of my native State, as loyal and as devoted as ever cherished the immortal principles of Thomas Jefferson, had reached the point where they were ready to despair and yield, and a convention was called in Mississippi to consider the advisability of disorganizing the Democratic party. But even in that trying hour there was a small though devoted band, in whose hearts the divine fire of the old Democracy was still burning, to protest with a tongue of flame and a voice of prophecy against the abandonment of our time-honored and undying organization. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Their wisdom prevailed. That convention adjourned, and instead of sending abroad the gospel of despair they sent a message of hope and courage that still animates the splendid men of that great Commonwealth. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Chairman, as a Democrat I favor the single gold standard and shall vote for this bill [applause on the Republican side], because if enacted into law it will fortify by statute the gold standard under which we are now living. There are features in the bill which I do not approve. It treats of too many subjects. I should like to see eliminated the provisions for retiring the greenback and Treasury notes and reissuing greenbacks only in exchange for gold, and for coining silver bullion to take the place of the Treasury notes that are canceled. These provisions are of far-reaching effect and will stir up the feelings of many of our well-meaning people in the West and South, who consider the greenbacks of a sacred order and the national banks a menace to the country's welfare. More deliberate action before so complete a revolution in our system is effected would tend to conciliation of all—a wise and desirable object in all forms of government, especially this of ours.

But the bill is a move in the right direction. The solution of the currency question overshadows all other questions in the eyes of the people. Facts and conditions should be accepted as they are found. Theories are meat food for debating societies. As our country is great, so is our responsibility great to sustain and build up the national credit. We are living under the gold standard to-day. The country is enjoying great and enviable prosperity. Business is booming, labor is employed, capital is active. These conditions should be assured to us so far as human foresight makes their assurance possible. The little cloud upon the horizon still threatening us and breeding distrust of the permanence of our prosperity is fear lest the unwritten law which our Secretaries of the Treasury of both political faiths have heretofore obeyed in meeting the obligations of the country in gold may, some day, at some unexpected hour, be violated.

The country demands that what is done now by a custom henceforth shall be done by mandate of law; that the haphazard basis under which we live, menacing alike the credit of the United States and the individual, shall be exchanged for a settled and definite policy, capable of modifications to meet new conditions when those conditions arise, but then only by the deliberate action of the Congress of the United States, and not at the will of a single Secretary of the Treasury. Confidence is an element of far greater importance in fixing and upholding prices than the amount of money in circulation. National not less than individual prosperity is dependent upon confidence, which in turn produces stability. A stable measure of value alone can produce stability. Be it ever so improbable, the threatened possibility of the debasement of the existing standard of value checks enterprise and locks up capital. Remove all doubt, restore confidence, and capital will find employment; employment will earn good wages, which mean prosperity for the people.

Gold is the only standard of value among the enlightened commercial nations. The only basis of equality upon which gold and silver can be concurrently coined into money is the basis of the commercial value of the metal contained in the respective coins. The proposition that there can be but one standard seems to me self-evident. To-day silver is a commodity of fluctuating value, governed by the laws of supply and demand. A ratio can not be found between silver and gold which will remain constant. Under the double standard change in the ratio of value between the two metals gives two measures of value.

When the coinage laws of the country permit the free coinage of both metals with full legal-tender qualities at a ratio of value which substantially does not conform to their respective intrinsic values, both kinds of coin can not be kept in circulation at the same time. Debts will be paid in the less valuable, and the more valuable will be withdrawn from circulation or sent out of the country to markets where its full value can be obtained. History demonstrates the truth of this assertion; there is nothing new in it. Gold is the standard of value, the least liable to fluctuation, and therefore it is the best standard. The power does not lie in the Government to fix the price of a commodity through legislative enactment. Value is, and must ever be, intrinsic.

Work produces prosperity; confident capital gives work; stability of the currency creates confidence. A discredited currency is alike disastrous to the nation as a whole and to the individual citizen, restricts commercial enterprise, and limits the power to earn, therefore the thrift and industry of the people. In the gold standard lies the future prosperity and success of our beloved country. This is my rooted belief. I would not be representing the public opinion of my constituents if I took any other stand.

Yet it is hard to be at variance with many of one's party associates, and I appreciate and am deeply grateful to those whose views differ with mine for the generous treatment which has been extended to such of us on this side of the House sharing opinions on the currency question similar to those I have expressed. We will rejoice indeed when this currency question is settled right, in law, for good and for all, and is eliminated from the field of politics. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to take any part in this debate until within the last five minutes, but when I heard my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in his despairing tones, admit among the secrets of the Democratic party that it had been gravely considered whether under present conditions that great party had not better disband and go out of the calamity business, I thought it my duty to offer my condolence to the gentlemen on the other side of the House and at the same time to express my feeble wish that the Democratic party would not go out of business.

It is necessary to have an opposition party in this country, and nothing pleases this side of the House better than the present organized Democratic minority on the other side. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

I have listened somewhat to this debate, Mr. Chairman, and I have noticed the change of tone on the other side of the House. Three years ago, with the gloom that surrounded this country and every phase of industry, we were told morning, noon, and night, with a vehemence worthy of a better cause, that nothing would ever take this country out of the slough of despond except the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; and it would seem almost as though the gentlemen on the other side were growing wiser from experience, because we have hardly seen a man who had the courage to come out now in this debate and avow himself vigorously a disciple of the 16 to 1 idea.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says that the first section of this bill has been the law since 1873, and that the framers of the bill must have overlooked that fact, that this was the law. Why, we on this side of the House have known it for the past twenty-six years that gold was the standard of value in the United States, and it was only because some of you gentlemen on that side did not understand it that we proposed to put it into this bill and enact it into law, that the standard of value as now should be the gold dollar throughout the United States. But that is only a sort of a preamble to the bill.

There were other questions about which there were more serious difficulties. We held that coin, nominated in the bonds after the gold standard was fixed, was an agreement by which the United States pledged itself in every bond to pay according to the gold standard and that these obligations must be paid in gold dollars. It is true now and then a man arose and denied this proposition. It is true that the Democratic party were united against it.

It is true that in 1895, when the Treasury was bankrupt, when the gold had been driven out of the country because the balance due Europe was against this country from year to year and gold was being exported, when the Government was in distress, when your last Secretary of the Treasury was driven almost to despair and desperation, with only $40,000,000 in the gold reserve, some shrewd bankers from New York drove a hard bargain with the Government of the United States and demanded $16,000,000 more for $82,000,000 worth of bonds payable in coin than they demanded for the bonds payable in gold. They came to us with that proposition.

They said, "If you will give us gold bonds we will give $16,000,000 more for them than we will for the coin bonds you have been issuing." I was in the House; I felt it my duty then to vote to put the word "gold" in the bond and save the people of this country from paying that $16,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have never had occasion to apologize for it since, and I certainly do not do so now.

I can not at this moment remember the exact figures, but the market price of coin bonds on the very day this contract was made with the Secretary was very nearly, if not quite, the price this syndicate proposed to pay for bonds payable in gold. Notwithstanding this stab at the credit of the country, these thrifty gentlemen within sixty days had an opportunity to sell these bonds at a profit, which, with the interest thereon, will, by the time they become due, in 1925, approximate the sixteen millions we tried to save the Government.

But we propose by this bill to make it no longer doubtful to any citizen of the United States or to any man anywhere that the bonds and obligations of the Government are to be paid in the gold dollar of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did not the gentleman from New York, on the 25th day of August, 1893, declare here that there was not enough gold in the world, and that we should have silver also as the standard of value?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know the day or date, but I remember once that I gave my views upon the coinage question. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to read this speech? It is very brief.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I can state it in fewer words.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have it quoted literally from what you said.

Mr. PAYNE. I will tell you also I have not read that speech in six years. I said in that speech, Mr. Chairman, that I believed the single gold standard was the best standard. Why? Because it fluctuated less than any other; that values under it were more stable, that the money would be worth a hundred cents in the morning and in the night and to every one who took it; and for that reason I would favor the gold standard.

There were two reasons why I would consent also to the coinage of silver. One was that silver was largely an American product, and I did not desire to take anything away from the value of an American product. I was willing to favor and to furnish a market for it; and I said in addition to that that I was willing to have the coinage of silver go along with the coinage of gold at a proper ratio between the two, and when the nations of the earth could agree to it we should take both metals as a standard of our coinage.

Mr. RICHARDSON rose.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman can not read a short extract from a speech that I made and do justice to the speech.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It will show some very great inconsistencies in the position of the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. All right, read it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman said on the 25th of August, 1893:

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why we should have another standard of value than gold, and that reason turns on the question whether there is enough gold in all the world to do the business of the world as a money basis. I believe there is not. I believe that of this metal, which can stand the test of fire, which is light and convenient to be carried about, there is not enough to do the business of the world. There is another that appeals strongly to me as an American. There is another metal, the white metal, one-third of which is produced in our own country, and for this reason I am all the more in favor of honoring silver as a standard of value.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Now, I said all that, Mr. Chairman, and I said more, too.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is enough. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. That seems to be enough for the gentleman, and if he will go on reading it, he may be satisfied; but if he does not, before I conclude he may not be.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that I was willing to go with the other nations of the world for the free and unlimited coinage of both metals. I remember something about a cistern illustration about which much had been claimed in that Congress, I think, by Mr. Bryan. Mr. Bryan said something about connecting two cisterns with a pipe and the level of water would be the same in each cistern; but I said that if you had water in one cistern and something lighter, like oil, in another, the level would not be the same, and I said in the mere adoption of the free coinage of gold and silver at any ratio it always occurred that there was a difference between the coinage value and the market value, and that the one that was worth the least in the market would carry the burden of the circulation, while the other would go to the melting pot; and if the coinage of the world stood on the same ratio of silver and gold it would always occur that one of the metals would carry the business of the world and the other would not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And I said it would not make much difference which metal carries the business of the world, because exchanges between the countries would be on the same ratio and upon the same metal, and there would not be fluctuations between one and the other that would destroy the value over night. Now, I stated all that in 1893, and if the gentleman can get any consolation out of it, he is welcome. In 1896 I subscribed to the Chicago platform. [Great laughter.]

I have got a good place mixed up with a bad party. I subscribed to the St. Louis platform in favor of maintaining by all means the gold standard and at the same time in favor of international bimetallicism. But the dream of that time is past, Mr. Chairman. I see no prospect of international bimetallicism. Since I have sat here and heard this debate and seen the Democratic party just about ready to withdraw from their 16 to 1 proposition, so that they sit here almost mute on the subject, as if they wished they might let go this thing in the next campaign.

When I hear the gentleman from Texas say that we are for declaring the gold standard because we believe the people are now willing to let us declare the gold standard, I wonder if the gentleman has had his ear to the ground and heard from the people. When I hear all these things, Mr. Chairman, I begin to think that silver is a thing relegated to the past and that the commercial transactions of this country and of the world hereafter will stand upon that single metal which will stand the test of fire and which does not fluctuate in value, gold, as the basis of money. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is amusing sometimes to hear our Democratic friends claim every condition as favoring their idea. It is not a great many years ago that we used to hear about the high prices of things we had to buy, and they wanted to get back to the good old Democratic times and low prices. Well, they got back to them in 1894 by Democratic methods, and then they began to talk about falling prices, and we never could have prosperity with falling prices, and they demanded that we should have better prices. By what means? By taking all the silver burden of the world and opening our mints and coining 50 cents into a dollar—cutting the dollar in two to get better prices.

That was the burden of their song then, but they do not say much about it to-day. They say we have got better prices because more gold has been discovered and that there is more gold in this country than there was in 1896. My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says that wheat was twice as high in 1873 as it was in 1896; that cotton was twice as high in 1873 as it was in 1896; and he says that these conditions have changed because there was both gold and silver then and only gold now, and that prices have declined in accordance with the decrease of basic money.

Why, in 1873 there was of basic money in the United States, gold and silver combined, only $3.29 per capita, and to-day there is $13 per capita of gold, the basic money of the United States, four times as much as there was in 1873. If the reasoning of our friends was correct, cotton and wheat should be worth four times as much to-day as in 1873. But the gentleman admits they are worth not half as much now as then. This is the result of his argument to prove that they were right in 1896, when they told us that nothing in the world would bring this country back to prosperity except the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, like my friend who preceded me, I had no intention to take any part in this debate. I had the honor to belong to the committee that framed this bill, and it represents my sentiments. Therefore, there did not seem to be any necessity that I should consume the time of this committee in the discussion of the bill. But some remarks that have been made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] have suggested to me the propriety of calling the attention of the committee to some historic facts. The United States has been practically on the gold standard since 1834, more than threescore years. In that year we undertook to establish that which all history has proclaimed to be impossible, a double standard. Silver was undervalued, its mint value was less than its bullion value, and as a consequence gold became the money and the standard of value of the country. From that day to this, even during the period of the suspension of specie payments, all contracts have been made and all articles bought and sold with relation to their gold value.

And so in 1853, when we reduced the amount of bullion in our subsidiary coin, the committee that reported the bill to this House declared on the floor of this House that the purpose of their bill was to establish gold as the standard of value. That is over forty years ago. And so the same declaration was substantially made in the much-abused act of 1873. And yet, despite all these legislative declarations, the necessity does exist to-day for the enactment of this law.

Now, our friends upon the other side say that the Republican party has changed. It has changed, Mr. Chairman, just as the man has changed from the boy. The change that has taken place in the Republican party has been the change of growth. The Republican party has changed because the Republican party is a progressive party. It is because it meets exigencies as they arise. It is because it is a party that legislates for the present upon the theories of the present and in answer to the demands of the present, and not a party like the Democratic party, that knows neither principle nor theory unless they are to be found within the pages of the writings of Thomas Jefferson. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, in 1896 the Republican party declared in its platform that gold was the standard of value, and it declared furthermore in these words:

All our paper currency must be maintained at a parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolable the obligations of the United States, and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

A declaration pursuant to the entire history of the Republican party, which has always stood upon the proposition that every American dollar, whether of metal or paper, should be the equal of every other American dollar, and that bondholder and wage-earner should be paid honestly, in accordance with the terms of their contract, according to the American standard of money.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says, Why reenact what is already the law? Because the Democratic party, notwithstanding these historic facts, notwithstanding the declarations repeatedly made in our legislation, have uniformly contended that the obligations of the United States should be paid in coin. Gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber will not forget the struggle in this House over the Teller resolution. They will not forget that it was by reason of a Republican majority that that resolution was voted down here, while at the other end of the Capitol, where the Democratic party was in power, it was voted up and a declaration made that the United States had a right under its legislation and its history to pay in a depreciated currency. It is because we would remove all doubt that we write into our statute book to-day, that we give it the force and effect and majesty of public law, that an American dollar is a dollar measured according to the gold standard, and that every creditor is entitled to be paid in conformity with that standard.

And there is another reason why we write into our statute books the gold standard, and that is, because, taking past experience as a lesson, we know that at some time or other it might be in the power of a Secretary of the Treasury to reduce this country to silver monometallism by exercising a discretion that under existing law it is contended he has to pay the national obligations in coin.

We would so have it that, whether there be a Democratic Executive in power, a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House, all the obligations of the Government shall still be payable in gold unless, in answer to the sovereign will of the people, a declaration shall be put upon the statute books to the contrary. That is the reason, I will say, in answer to my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], why we write upon the statute books not a new principle, but give to an old principle the new value of enacted law.

Now, my friend has the honesty, that very few gentlemen upon that side of the House have had, to recognize that the country is to-day in the enjoyment of an unbounded prosperity; but he attributes that prosperity to the increase in the output of gold, and to other causes wholly separate and apart from the policies of the Republican party. I will tell the gentleman why it is that the country is enjoying prosperity to-day. When Mr. McKinley came into office this country was in the very depths of despair. The nation had almost collapsed. Everything seemed to be wrong, everything seemed to have gone to ruin, and yet Mr. McKinley was in office only a very short time when business revived and the country entered upon that upward career the climax of which, we have reason to believe, has not yet been reached. Why? Because Mr. McKinley had not been in office two weeks until he called the legislative branch of the Government into session, and that legislative branch had not been in session more than two weeks more when there was sent from this end of the Capitol to the other a tariff law that reversed the policy of the Democratic party and substituted for a deficit in our revenues abundant revenues to meet the national needs. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Because with the access to power of the Republican party there came to the people of this country renewed confidence and belief in the future. Why, from 1879, when we resumed specie payments, down till 1893, the first year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, nobody supposed there was anything the matter with our currency. During all those years the $100,000,000 of the gold reserve never suffered the loss of a penny. Why? Because day by day there came into the Treasury of the United States from the custom-houses of the country revenues sufficient to meet the daily needs of the Government. Prosperity had not deserted us; the clouds had not arisen over our horizon until the people had found that under Democratic policy, under the Wilson bill, our revenues became insufficient to meet our needs. And prosperity returned to us in the wake of confidence, awakened because an Administration was in power that stood upon the platform of protection to our industries, protection to our Treasury, and sound money. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate with attention as it has been participated in by both sides of this Chamber. It was opened on this side by a careful, clear, exhaustive analysis of the provisions of this bill. I have not heard any fair, logical answer made to that argument. I have not heard from that side of the Chamber, with possibly one or two exceptions, any attempt to assign a valid reason why the United States should not declare to-day that gold is its standard of value. You gentlemen have talked politics, you have prated about trusts, some of you have even denied that the full sunshine of prosperity is about you—that there was any prosperity. Those of you who have admitted that prosperity exists have assigned reasons for it wholly apart from the policy of the Republican party.

You told us three years ago, when you argued after the fashion of my friend from Texas upon the line of wheat prices and silver prices coinciding, that no prosperity would come, that no prices would rise, that we would not get out of the slough of despond unless we opened our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. With the exception of two or three gentlemen, in addition to the gentleman from Texas, not one of them occupying a position or having a standing that gives us any reason to believe that he spoke for anyone but himself has dared to say that you believe to-day in the doctrine of the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. You have talked bimetalism, but you have not dared to assert that you stand to-day upon your old doctrine, that doctrine on which the issue of 1896 was fought.

The real reason, the true reason, why you gentlemen are opposed to this bill has been stated in a sentence by that gentleman who has so successfully made demagoguery a profession, as a means of livelihood; who from his wanderings out in Texas has said, "This bill ought not to pass because it is not in the interest of the Democratic party." [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the only reason that has been assigned against this bill, assigned by your leader, whose high ideal I trust you appreciate. What an inspiring leadership that must be! A great question, affecting the financial standing of the United States and its citizens, to be voted down because it is not in the interest of the Democratic party!

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In the interview to which the gentleman has referred he did not use the language, "Democratic party." What he did say was, "a democracy."

Mr. DALZELL. He did not say "a" at all, but did say "the Democracy."

Mr. RICHARDSON. He said the Democracy, and not the Democratic party. I think the gentleman to whom he refers said "Democracy" and not "the Democratic party."

Mr. DALZELL. He said "the Democracy," possibly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not fair to say "the Democratic party."

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman knows as well as I do myself that the meaning of the interview was that the bill should not be passed because it was not in the interest of the Democratic party.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He did not say "the Democratic party," but said "Democracy."

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman knows as well as I do that that was his meaning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I deny it, and state that he said "Democracy."

Mr. DALZELL. Then I assert that that was his meaning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Here is the interview, and the word that he used was "Democracy."

Mr. DALZELL. Well, then, I accept "the Democracy;" but I say that the leading Democratic press of this country caught the meaning of it, and I say further that he who stands for his party said in a sentence what it took you gentlemen a week to say, that this bill ought not to pass because it is not in the interest of the Democratic party. And he spoke truly. It is not in the interest of the Democratic party. It is contrary to your policy.

Your policy would reduce the country to the low grade of silver monometallism. You would cut in two every pensioner; you would cut in two the wages of every wage-earner; you would cut in two the money that is going to the beneficiary of every life-insurance policy, and the deposit of every savings-bank depositor. You would introduce a panic and financial ruin and sacrifice that which is dearer than life itself—the national honor. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Thank God, you can not do it! [Renewed applause.] I say it reverently, thank God you can not do it. When the vote shall be taken on this bill, you will find all on this side of the House united, to a man, registering their votes in favor of national honor, and we shall not be alone. We shall welcome to our unbroken ranks not a few brave Democrats who are uncowed by the party whip and who are too true to themselves and their constituents to deceive them. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected until a few moments ago to say anything in regard to the pending measure, and the way I come to say anything now is that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] informed me that he did not think he would speak out his time, and asked me to fill it for him.

I listened a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, to the eloquent peroration of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] in regard to the immortality of the Democratic party. He told us how the Democratic party had survived all its iniquities, how it had come through the nullification stage, the war stage, the reconstruction stage, the greenback, rag-money stage, the free-trade stage, and the free-silver craze, and I supposed he was going to wind up with Mr. Macaulay's famous sentence how it would still survive when some traveler from New Zealand would stand upon a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, the very reason why we desire to put this bill into law is the undying quality of the Democratic party. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party, if it had not the vitality of sin itself would have perished long ago. As long as sin and error last it will last. Not until the millennium comes will it pass away. When that time shall come, so fondly looked for and hoped for by suffering men, it, too, will cease to exist, with all the ills and errors which from the days of Adam until now have afflicted suffering humanity. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] The reason why we want to put this bill into law is because we fear, and the country fears, that God, in His infinite wisdom and inscrutable providence, may some day again see fit to chasten this country and deliver it over to the supremacy of the Democratic party. That is the reason why we want to put this measure into law, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SULZER. We will do it next year.

Mr. MORRIS. It may be. I have not forgotten the warning of 1892, how we stood on every stump and pointed to the magnificent conditions then existing, and warned the people against the supremacy of the Democratic party. I have not forgotten that for some unknowable reason the people for the first time in more than thirty years had then at last put the Government in all its branches in the possession of that party. And I have not forgotten that from that hour until the Republican party came into power again there was not a day that the people of the country did not repent it in sackcloth and ashes. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill is only the crystallization into law of the uniform practice and unbroken policy of the Republican party ever since the war. This morning, for about five minutes, I took the time to run over some of General Grant's messages to Congress, and I find him there saying again and again that the standard of value of this country is the gold standard.

Now, gentlemen, I am not troubled like some others by what they may have said before. I have nothing to apologize for. I came into public life as the advocate of the existing gold standard. No free silver in my record. I remember in 1894 that I stood up in the campaign for the gentleman who preceded me and advocated that same standard, and he did, too. I have now in my pocketbook—"I keep it as a lucky piece—here it is [holding it up], a Mexican silver dollar.

We stumped with these dollars in our hands—an American limited-coinage silver dollar and a Mexican free-coinage dollar—and we both held them up, the free-coinage Mexican dollar side by side with the American dollar, and we both proclaimed that the only reason why that American dollar did not fall as the Mexican dollar had, down to the value of the bullion in it, was that it was a limited-coinage dollar backed by the pledge and credit of the great American nation that it should be kept at par with gold. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL and others. Whom do you refer to?

Mr. MORRIS. Oh, they all know to whom I refer. That was our argument. We said that we favored and would welcome international agreement for the free coinage of silver, if we could get it.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MORRIS. Oh, I do not want to yield to the gentleman from Ohio; I have but five minutes. We said if we could not get international bimetalism we would stand everlastingly for that practice and that policy which would keep every dollar of American money worth 100 cents in gold. Oh, we soared into the very heavens in that campaign. I declared that as the eagle could soar to heaven and look into the sun, so the eagle upon our coined pieces should be able to soar into the heaven of the nations and look all the world in the face and acknowledge the superiority of no other nation's money. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what we declared.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does the gentleman think it could have carried any more silver.

Mr. MORRIS. I do not. I wish I had the time to analyze this bill. I want to state what is the matter with the Democratic party.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. What is the matter with you?

Mr. MORRIS. I am all right. Give me a little water while I dress down these Democrats. [Great laughter.] They told me about five minutes ago that they wanted me to speak. I said, "I have not prepared anything, but I never saw a day when I could not dress down the Democratic party, and I can do it now." [Laughter and applause.]

I can do it now, and I will do it. What is the matter with you? What are you doing now? It is just exactly the same thing that you did in 1895, exactly the same thing; the same old game of attempting to stampede men with new battle cries and by playing upon prejudice and distress. I do not forget, gentlemen; I remember too well how in 1892 the people turned you into power and how then those troubles came upon us. In 1894 we went to the people again with woe, want, and desolation on every hand, we turned to the Republican party as to the shadow of a great rock in a thirsty land. We said, "Turn back, turn back, turn away from this Democratic party and put back the great party in charge of the country under which it is always prosperous."

And the people did turn back. The people turned back, and in 1894 they sent a Republican majority to this House of more than 100, among them my distinguished predecessor, elected here on a platform declaring that every dollar of our money should be as good as gold; declaring that we were in favor of a protective tariff; declaring that the only salvation for the country would be in announcing that the first thing we should do would be to restore to the laborer the opportunity to find a day's employment at a fair day's wages. That is what we said.

The Democrats saw the writing on the wall. They saw fate staring them in the face. They dared not go to the country on anything they had ever said or proposed before, and then they began to wander around in this mire of free silver. In those days of almost universal bankruptcy they caught many men, some strong-minded men and some weak-minded men. They caught some of the best men in my own district, and they came very near catching a majority of the district. Now what are they doing? They remember the prophecies they made in 1896. They see that not one of them has been fulfilled. They see that all their predictions have gone to pieces. They see that now that the people have brought the Republican party back into power we stand in the sunshine of an era of prosperity such as neither this nor any other country has ever seen before. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And with this record behind them, with these prophecies behind them, with all these things behind them, it is no wonder that they seek to escape from free coinage at 16 to 1 and begin to shout "Trusts!" "Trusts!" "Corruption!" "Fraud!" and nothing else. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That is what is the matter.

Now, gentlemen, when I think of this Democratic party I am reminded of a little story that I heard last year. I did not expect to say anything in this debate, not a word, but it has taken a peculiar turn.

When we first began I thought it was going to be the most Chesterfieldian controversy that was ever seen; that we were going to hear long-winded discussions about falling prices and rising prices and silver going to par on the other side, and the stability and glory of the gold standard, and, perhaps, some apologies for past errors on this side.

I thought that sort of thing would proceed, and that it would be the "distinguished gentleman from this State and the distinguished gentleman from that," but we had not progressed a day before a gentleman on your side got up and talked about how we had carried the election in 1896 by the most outrageous fraud and corruption. Think of that coming from a party which clasp to its bosom this day a man who, after a great State has expressed its will in the only legal and orderly manner known to our institutions, has been attempting, willfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, to filch from the people the result of that expression. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Yes, to filch it from them, because he has not used the bold methods of the highway robber, but the sneaking and detestable devices of the pickpocket. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now, I say you remind me of a story, and I remind myself of a story. [Laughter.] Out in Dakota once two gentlemen belonging to the same party made up their minds that they wanted to run for the same office.

At this point the hour of adjournment arrived and the Chairman's gavel fell.

Mr. MORRIS. I will tell you that story some other time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have time to give the Democratic party the devil. He has neglected to do so, so far. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 1 and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1899, on the 19th day of said month.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit a report of survey and estimate for the improvement of the Great Pee Dee River, South Carolina, between Cheraw and the Wilmington, Columbia and Augusta Railroad bridge.

RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit a report of survey and estimate for the improvement of the Great Pee Dee River, South Carolina, between Cheraw and the Wilmington, Columbia and Augusta Railroad bridge—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit a request for the withdrawal of papers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KERR asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of William Thomas, Fifty-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the rules require that the request shall be coupled with the statement that there has been no adverse report in the case.

The SPEAKER. Such is the statement in this request.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was not so preferred.

The Clerk read as follows:

No adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Clerk did not read that before.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] will act as Speaker during the evening session. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House is in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. RAY of New York as Speaker pro tempore.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House under the special order will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 1, the financial bill.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I would be false to the district I represent, recreant to the trust reposed in me by the people of my State, the majority of whom declared in 1896 for the principles of the Chicago platform, if I failed as a Representative in the Congress of the United States not only to record my vote, but also my emphatic protest against the legislation proposed by this bill. In the limited time allotted me in this debate I can do no more. This much, however, I do fearlessly and with a calm confidence in the truth of my convictions upon the subject under discussion.

Section 1 of this bill provides:

That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.2 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] said that—

The law of February 12, 1873, clearly adopts the gold one-dollar piece, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains of gold, as the unit of value. That statute has never been repealed nor directly amended and, by legal construction, is in force to-day. Yet subsequent acts have so affected it that there is some doubt as to whether gold is fully recognized as our monetary standard.

In other words, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], the introducer of this bill, and the Republican party propose to make assurance doubly sure and fasten upon the American people beyond controversy, by the first section of this bill, the single gold standard.

Something has been said in this debate about our national honor and credit. I am ready to vie with any gentleman upon this floor in my love of country and my desire to maintain our national honor. I am proud of our past history from the day we overcame old England in 1776 and 1812, upon land and sea, up to our late glorious victories in the war with Spain. I love our flag and our free institutions, that Constitution which, says a distinguished North Carolinian, Judge Gaston, "with all its pretended defects, all its alleged violations, has conferred more benefit on man than ever yet flowed from any human institution," and which, says Mr. Gladstone, "is the greatest work ever struck off in a given time by the brain and purpose of man." But because I do love my country and its Constitution, the broad shield and panoply of our liberties, I do not wish to see her adopt a monetary policy subservient to England and English gold; a policy of subservience to the money changers of Europe and America; a policy which strikes down as basic money one of the money metals of the Constitution. Such subservience and such policy can not maintain our national credit or honor.

BRIEF STATEMENT OF WHAT THE BILL PROPOSES.

Very briefly stated, this bill proposes to pay every bond of the Government now existing or hereafter to be issued in gold and, if need be, exchange every form of our money for gold alone. It proposes to establish a bank or money trust with the Secretary of the Treasury as the sun and center of the financial system. All the bonds of the Government, including those issued by the Cleveland Administration, about $262,000,000, which the Congress of the United States expressly declined to make payable in anything but "coin," and those issued for the expenses of the war with Spain, about $198,000,000; all the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman law of July 14, 1890; all the United States notes or "greenbacks," and "all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money" must be performed in conformity with the gold standard established by section 1 of this bill.

Even silver dollars and silver certificates are exchangeable in the division of issue and redemption, provided for in the third section of the bill, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, such course be necessary. In the event there is not sufficient gold in the Treasury to carry out the provisions of the bill, full authority is given the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds without limit to supply the deficiency. Since the days of Andrew Jackson and the United States Bank no such scheme has ever been matured to place the whole money power in the hands of the banks. Since the foundation of our Government never before has any party, except the followers of Palmer and Buckner, declared unreservedly for the gold standard. Therefore this bill marks a new era in the history of our country.

Heretofore legislative restrictions have been suggested, if any at all, to regulate the coinage of both gold and silver, but in this bill there are no restrictions and there is no concealment. We adopt the policy upon which Great Britain entered in 1816, making gold alone our primary and redemption money. For the first time in its history the Republican party has declared without qualification, by this bill, in favor of the gold standard.

REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC PLATFORMS COMPARED.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] told us we had been living under the gold standard since 1834; and if not since 1834, then since 1853; and if not since 1853, then since 1873; but it is well known and it is not ancient history that the Republican party in its national platform of 1888 condemned the Democratic Administration for an alleged effort to demonetize silver. Mr. McKinley was chairman of the platform committee, and not only reported the platform, but was elected to Congress upon it and helped to elect Mr. Harrison President on it. This is the platform he submitted:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

They knew then that the great Democratic party, which has never taken a position as a party organization in favor of the gold standard and against the free coinage of silver, and which time and time again in its national platforms of 1880, 1884, 1888, 1892, and 1896 has indissolubly linked together both gold and silver as the honest money of the Constitution, had always been true to the white metal. Yet they professed to condemn us then, although the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] says we have been living all the time under the gold standard.

In 1892 in national convention the Republican party adopted a platform in which it declared:

The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetalism and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money.

In 1896 the Republican party declared for international bimetalism. There has never been a Republican platform written up to 1896, inclusive, which did not profess some favor for some form of bimetalism. But now, in three short years, what a change has come over the spirit of its dreams! It has crossed the Rubicon! And the surrender to the gold syndicate is complete. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] insists that conditions have changed. True, the gold discoveries in the Klondike and in South Africa, giving us a more plentiful supply of gold as a money metal; the war with Spain, famine in Russia and in India, all creating a demand for American products, have affected prices to some extent; but these are things for which the Republican party can in no wise claim credit, though it is in the habit of claiming credit for most anything, even the rain and dews, the short crops, or the bountiful harvests.

Compare with the inconsistent platform utterances of the Republican party the repeated declarations of Democratic platforms in favor of both gold and silver coinage, beginning with the platform of 1880, in which the Democratic party says:

We believe in home rule, strict maintenance of the public faith, honest money, consisting of gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin on demand.

THE SECOND BATTLE IN 1900.

Mr. Chairman, we accept the wager of battle. We are willing to contrast the platforms of the Democratic party with the platforms of the Republican party; we are willing to contrast the positions of both parties upon this money question; we are willing to enter the arena of national politics in 1900 and go to the country and before the people upon the issue which the people will raise upon this bill. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] referred to the first battle of the standards in 1896 in terms of derision. "He laughs best who laughs last," and the gentleman from Iowa had best await the decision at the ballot box in 1900—the second battle—which will be waged then. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Three years ago, in the Senate chamber of the capitol of my State, as an elector for President and Vice-President of the United States, I had the honor of placing in nomination for the Presidency that splendid champion of the plain people and of the money of the Constitution, William Jennings Bryan. I said then, and believe it will be verified if you pass this bill, though I do not assume the rôle of a prophet:

The same forces and influences which in this year 1896 dominated the Democratic national convention at Chicago, promulgated its platform, and nominated its candidate, Mr. Bryan, by a two-thirds vote, and united in one solid and unbroken phalanx the voters of three parties upon the financial issue in opposition to the gold-standard Republican platform, in the next national election will again unite this army of American voters, vast and daily growing vaster, and this great army, with its banner flung to the breeze of heaven, inscribed with our battle cry, "Equality before the law, and the money of the Constitution," will sweep in that second battle not only the States of the South and far West, but the now pivotal States of the middle West.

Of course, other most important issues will press for consideration in 1900, such as the great questions of the regulation and control of trusts, the government of our new possessions, Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, imperialism or anti-imperialism, involving as these questions do to a large extent the future of our national life. But this bill, by the action of the Republican party, makes plain and clear an issue which that party insists in this debate is a dead issue, namely, whether we shall have gold monometallism, on the one hand, or bimetalism, the money of the Constitution, on the other hand, as the law of the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE MONEY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Chairman, when we were only 3,500,000 strong, and had established our independence through eight years of blood and suffering, we adopted a Constitution. It provided for gold and silver as the constitutional money of the country. Section 8 of Article I of that Constitution gives Congress the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

Section 10 of Article I prohibits the States from "making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." Immediately after the adoption of this Constitution the patriots who had led our armies to victory and constructed our Constitution passed in the Congress of the United States in 1792 the first coinage law. It not only provided for the use of both gold and silver, but adopted silver as the unit and fixed the relative value of gold and silver in coinage. Afterwards, when a change in the ratio between the two metals was made, it was done by reducing the number of grains in the gold dollar instead of increasing the number of grains in the silver dollar.

Under free coinage the young Republic was started upon its great career; under free coinage we fought the war of 1812 with our old mother England; under it we purchased the Louisiana Territory, from which so many great States have been carved out, adding so many stars to the flag of the Union; under it we conducted the war with Mexico, and under it we lived through the Administrations of all the Presidents, with some slight changes in the ratio between the gold and the silver dollar, until the Administration of General Grant and the passage of the Mint bill of February 12, 1873. The ratio of 15 to 1, established by the act of 1792, was changed to 16 to 1 by the act of June 28, 1834, which reduced the number of grains in the gold eagle, and that ratio has been retained to date as the monetary ratio between the gold and silver dollar.

OPINIONS OF WEBSTER AND BLAINE AND OTHERS.

On the subject that gold and silver are constitutional money metals Daniel Webster said, in the United States Senate, December 21, 1836:

I am certainly of the opinion that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country and that neither Congress nor any State has any authority to establish any other standard or to displace this.

This is the opinion of the "great expounder of the Constitution." In this connection I will quote from the opinion of one of the most eminent men of the Republican party in all its history, the Hon. James G. Blaine, who, in a speech in the United States Senate, February 7, 1878, said:

I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution—indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which that great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on Congress to declare that either metal should not be money. Congress has, therefore, in my judgment, no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold; no power to demonetize either any more than to demonetize both. * * * Few persons can be found, I apprehend, who will maintain that Congress possesses the power to demonetize both gold and silver or that Congress could be justified in prohibiting the coinage of both; and yet in logic and legal construction it would be difficult to show where and why the power of Congress over silver is greater than over gold, greater over either than over the two. If, therefore, silver has been demonetized, I am in favor of remonetizing it. If its coinage has been prohibited, I am in favor of ordering it to be resumed. If it has been restricted, I am in favor of having it enlarged.

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property. If, as the most reliable statistics affirm, there are nearly $7,000,000,000 of coin or bullion in the world not very unequally divided between gold and silver, it is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands.

Of like opinion have been the minds of some of the most eminent statesmen and public men of this and other leading nations of the world, such as Balfour in England, Bismarck in Germany, and Cernuschi in France, and such eminent public men in the United States as Senators VEST, COCKRELL, MORGAN, DANIEL, and TELLER, and a host of others. If there is any error in my views and the view of the Democratic party upon this money question, some of the best, wisest, and ablest men of the world have fallen into like grievous error. Our opponents may sneer at those who advocate silver coinage and contend that they are not keeping pace with the progress of the world, but as for myself, I do not feel at all lonesome among the distinguished men who have advocated bimetalism in the past and who advocate it now.

The issue is not so much between the gold standard and free silver coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1 as it is between gold monometallism and bimetalism. Had it not been for the adverse legislation, had it not been for the conspiracy entered into by those who own the gold and the bonds to strike down one of the money metals of the Constitution in order to satisfy their own personal greed, I believe that no question as to the parity would ever have arisen. It was not until the adverse legislation against silver began that the ratio between silver and gold began to part company. Mr. Chairman, the silver question is an old subject, but in order to make my argument and meaning clear and full I will review very briefly its history in this country.

BRIEF HISTORY OF SILVER COINAGE.

The act of 1792, establishing the mint, provided for the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold on a ratio of 15 to 1, and "that all the coin should be legal tender for all debts, public and private."

The act approved January 18, 1837, reiterated said provisions of the act of 1792, with the modification that the gold in the gold dollar is fixed at 23.22 fine instead of 24.75, as in the previous act, thus changing the ratio from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1.

By the act of 1873 silver dollars were dropped from coinage, and by the act of 1874, adopting the Revised Statutes, the legal-tender quality of silver coins was limited to $5.

The Bland Act of February 28, 1878, provides that "there shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars as provided in the act of January 18, 1837," and further directed the purchase of silver bullion at market prices in amounts not less than two million nor more than four million dollars' worth per month, and for the coinage of said bullion into dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver each, and repealed all acts inconsistent therewith. It also restored the full legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, except where otherwise stipulated in the contract.

The act of July 14, 1890, known as the Sherman Act, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at the market price 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion, and to issue in payment for such purchases Treasury notes of the United States, said notes to be redeemable in coin, and repealed so much of the Bland Act as required the monthly purchase and coinage of not less than two million nor more than four million dollars' worth of silver bullion.

Act approved November 3, 1893, repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, and declared it—to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals.

The act authorizing the refunding of the national debt (1870) and the act to provide for the resumption of specie payments (1875), under which the bonds extant were issued, both provide that the bonds issued thereunder shall be redeemable in coin of the present standard value, and the bonds so issued all so stipulate on their face.

Section 3693 of the Revised Statutes provides that the faith of the United States is pledged to the payment in coin of all the obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations has expressly provided that the same shall be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

THE MATTHEWS RESOLUTION AND OUR UNITED STATES BONDS.

In 1878, the year of the passage of the Bland Act, Congress passed, further, a concurrent resolution known as the Stanley Matthews resolution, which was embodied in the concurrent resolution of the Fifty-fifth Congress introduced by Senator TELLER, which was as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 22.

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it is provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor—

Now, by the bill under consideration, the Republican party proposes to change the original contract made with the holders of the bonds of the Government and make all of the same payable in gold instead of "coin," thereby giving to the holders of these bonds a bonus of millions of dollars, which upon the 1925 issue of bonds alone, as shown by the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], would be $60,000,000. In order to show the magnitude and extent of this gift practically of the Government to the holders of its bonds, I append a statement showing amount of our bonds outstanding July 1, 1896, taken from good authority, as follows:

4 per cent bonds of 1907.....	550,636,500
5 per cent bonds of 1904.....	100,000,000
4 per cent bonds of 1925.....	162,315,500
Total.....	847,316,500

To this statement must be added the sum of $198,000,000 issued for expenses of the war with Spain.

The entire national debt, more than a billion dollars, now existing, as well as any subsequent additions thereto, is to be paid in gold, notwithstanding the original contract to pay in "coin," in either gold or silver, at the option of the Government.

ALL OTHER OBLIGATIONS TO BE PAID IN GOLD OR EXCHANGED FOR GOLD. Again, by this bill all the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman law of July 14, 1890, $89,026,280, as well as all the United States notes, commonly known as greenbacks or legal tenders, $346,681,016, aggregating over $435,000,000, are to be redeemed in gold. Nay, more, if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury such course be necessary, even silver certificates and silver dollars are exchangeable for the same coin. Never before by the policy of the Treasury Department or by any act of Congress has there been any proposition which would either redeem or exchange silver dollars and silver certificates for gold coin. As late as 1896 there was issued, under the authority of the Treasury Department, Circular No. 123, in which the Secretary says:

Gold coins and standard silver dollars, being standard coins of the United States, are not redeemable. Silver certificates are receipts for standard silver dollars deposited and are redeemable in such dollars only.

I do not mean to insist that by this bill silver certificates and silver dollars are immediately redeemable in gold coin, like the United States notes or greenbacks and the Treasury notes under the Sherman law and the United States bonds, but I do say it is clear from this bill that even silver certificates, $400,643,504, and silver dollars, $81,978,872, may be either locked up in the division of issue and redemption of the Treasury Department or paid out in exchange for gold coin alone at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of this bill. The term "exchange" is used, but the meaning is practically the same. This bill means the locking up or destruction of nearly $500,000,000 of silver certificates and silver dollars.

It means, furthermore, in order to meet the constant drain upon the gold reserve in the United States Treasury, the further and constant sale of United States bonds to be issued at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve provided for under section 4 of this bill. It puts it within the power of one man, the head of the Treasury Department, to issue and sell gold bonds in his discretion, giving him an autocratic power over the finances of the Government without parallel or precedent. It places the issue of bonds and the exchange or redemption of every form of our money in the hands of one man, who in turn may be controlled by the bankers of the country.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER AND NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

It is said this bill authorizes a larger amount of small money, subsidiary silver, but while that is true it does not increase our circulation per capita, which, on December 1, 1899, was $25.75, according to the circular issued by the Treasury Department, for the bill provides (section 5, last clause):

Whenever any silver bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, shall be used in the coinage of subsidiary silver coin, an amount of Treasury notes, issued under said act, equal to the cost of the bullion contained in such coin shall be canceled and not reissued.

The advocates of the bill also make much of a proposed increase of national-bank-note circulation by allowing national banks to issue notes up to the par value of their bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, upon which their circulation is based. That is the sugar coating upon the bill. You refuse to open the mints to silver; you refuse to open the mints to the free coinage of anything but gold; silver and all other forms of money are made mere token money, based upon and redeemable in gold; you refuse to remove from State banks the 10 per cent tax and allow them to issue notes based upon the United States bonds or approved State bonds or other good securities, but you say to the national banks, "You may issue notes to the par value of your bonds."

But while power is given to expand their circulation to this extent they also have the right, power, and privilege to reduce their circulation. They may expand or contract the national-bank-note circulation at their own will and pleasure. They control the circulation, not the people or the Government. Those who hold the gold control the issue of bonds; the Government bonds are the basis of national-bank-note circulation; the banks expand or contract the issue of their notes as suits their interest and the demands of their business. The people must depend for a money supply upon the production and coinage of gold and upon national-bank notes. This forms a bank trust and money trust, the most gigantic of all trusts. You claim that it is a good feature to allow small national banks, with a capital of not less than $25,000, to organize in towns having a population which does not exceed 2,000.

Whatever good features this bill may possess, if it possess any, you know the rule of the House has been so framed as to preclude all amendments or vote upon any substitute or separate features of the bill. We must swallow the whole bill or vote against it as a whole. The effect of the last feature of the bill is destructive to private banks in many instances, destructive of competition, and already you are discussing the formation of branch banks. We will have at the great money centers the central luminary, the metropolitan bank, and in small towns the smaller country banks as satellites revolving around the great banking institutions of the money centers. Besides, you know the organization of these small banks is entirely at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such banks, says the bill, may be organized "with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

THE MEANING OF THE BILL AND THE PROBABLE RESULT.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] well said the other day this bill was to be passed to redeem a pledge made in the campaign of 1896 by the Republican party to the money power of the country. The time has arrived to foreclose the mortgage given by the Republican party, and in the light of history the allegation of the gentleman from Missouri does, indeed, seem to be true, and the words of the distinguished historian and scholar, Dr. John Clark Ridpath, upon the possible outcome of that campaign seem indeed to be prophetic. In his able article entitled "The Bond and the Dollar" Dr. Ridpath, speaking of the campaign of 1896, said:

If plutocracy wins the impending battle, what follows? We do not venture on prophecy, but only point out the logical and historical tendency of a present victory of the money power over the people.

In the first place, the gold standard will be fixed and fortified, and under it all the values of the world will be bolted down. All legal-tender paper money will be canceled and destroyed. This part of the program is already openly declared. The existing silver coinage will next be attacked, and not a dollar of it will be spared as primary money. It will be sent to the silversmiths, to the smelting pots of two continents, to the bullion shops of every mart, to the mints for subsidiary coinage, to every place where it may be consumed, until not one dollar of our old constitutional money shall remain.

The vacuum thus produced in the money supply of the people will be filled with bank bills, issued and loaned, expanded and contracted, at the pleasure of the owners. * * * Money may be wonderfully "easy," and for the day the false verdict against the people may be glorified. But in another day, the first day of alarm, this great nation will fall prostrate before the banks.

Then will come a panic, in comparison with which all preceding financial storms that have swept the country will be as zephyrs to the awful hurricane. Such will be the ruin that the fragments of exploded enterprises will not be worth the gathering. Before such a storm not a single legitimate business can survive. He who wishes to contribute to this catastrophe and to hasten its coming has only to follow his leaders until the victory of the money power over the people shall be confirmed by a majority of votes.

For myself, I do not propose to be a party to such a catastrophe, nor to legislation leading in such direction. I stand with the great Democratic party; that party which has ever stood for the plain people and for the money of the Constitution; with Jefferson, Jackson, Bryan, and its great leaders in defense of its immortal principles. Among those principles is the recognition of both gold and silver as the basis of our monetary system, and opposition to the centralization of the money power in the hands of the banks of the country.

For a century the Democratic party, true to those principles, has survived all the assaults made upon it, and by preserving them unimpaired it will win the second battle of the people in 1900. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the financial question is one that finds its way into every legislative body. Men may try to drive it from consideration, but, like the dream of the ancient ruler, it will not be banished. It seems to me, however, judging from the language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and others on that side of the Chamber, that they are like that great king in one regard, that they have permitted the dream to go from them and are not able to interpret the words after they are made known. It would be surprising, and humiliating as well, if some of the remarkable statements made by them to-day were placed in parallel columns with the contradictory statements made by them on this floor in other years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ever since the framers of the Constitution gave to Congress the right "to coin money and regulate the value thereof" there has been contention about the coinage and its value; and, perhaps, when the shades of evening shall fall for the last time, and the end of time is reached, men will yet be contending about the money question. This body can not evade its duties because the issues are continuing. Our colleagues across the Hall propose now to settle the matter by fixing the single standard of gold and making all else subservient to it as a basis; but the youngest member on this floor will never see the financial question settled, no difference how much he may become bowed with age nor how long hoary hairs may crown his temples, unless silver is restored to the place given it in the early legislation, its constitutional place as one of the coins of the nation.

When the first lawmakers met under the Constitution, they fixed the ratio between gold and silver and established a bimetallic basis, giving to both metals equal debt-paying power in these words:

That all gold and silver coins which shall have been struck at and issued from the said mint shall be a legal tender in all payments whatsoever.

Never was this equality and debt-paying capacity interfered with until the law of 1873 was enacted, which provided that silver should be a legal tender only in amounts not exceeding $5. If bimetallic currency could be sustained from 1792 to 1873, through the fearful crises through which this country was called to pass, who would say that at this day it could not sustain such currency?

It is claimed by some that conditions have changed. Yes, conditions have changed; yet they are more favorable to the maintenance of anything that this Government desires than ever in its history. At no time has it been so independent, never could it so safely assert itself, never did it exert the influence upon the affairs of men which it does at present. Why, the war with Spain gave notice to the world of the strength of this nation and its power to defend itself at one of its weakest points—naval warfare. If this country could maintain a bimetallic standard in the early and struggling period of its existence, why can not it do so now? Give to gold and silver the same legal-tender qualities and the present disparity between the metals will vanish.

It is contended that there has been a gold standard since 1834 by some. All admit that such standard has existed since 1873. Mr. Chairman, the American people will be content with that kind of gold standard which existed up to 1873. During that period, when the commercial value of silver as measured in gold was more than 100 cents, or, if measured in silver, when gold was commercially worth less than 100 cents on the dollar. It is contended now that "gold has intrinsic value that silver has not; that the 100 cents in a gold dollar is worth commercially 100 cents anywhere in the world; that silver, by reason of the impress of the stamp of the Government upon it, becomes worth 100 cents, but intrinsically is worth less than 45; that it does not, therefore, have an intrinsic value which is permanent and fixed; that part of the value which it secures comes to it through the Government."

Suppose, however, that this nation had demonetized gold instead of silver and that the other nations of the earth had taken a similar step, would anyone then contend that the intrinsic value of gold would be 100 cents when measured in silver? Would it not then be true that silver would be worth 100 cents wherever gold is now worth that sum? The law fixes the permanent value of the standard. In this nation when gold and silver were alike recognized the commercial value of each was about the same, and who will say that if bimetalism were restored silver would not occupy a similar place to gold, both intrinsically and commercially?

It is surprising the good that is alleged to come from the rule of the dominant party. Republican supremacy, we are told, means continued prosperity. The panic of 1893-94 is charged to the minority party because at that time it is alleged there was a Democratic Administration in charge. Who had control of this Government in all its branches prior to and during the great panic of 1873-74? Who was the cause of the soup houses of that period? Gentlemen forget the distressing nature of that panic. If the causes are to be found in political supremacy, then the Republican party alone is responsible for the dire distress of that time. Gentlemen forget that the year 1892, referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] as the most prosperous since the civil war, so wrought upon the Treasury of the United States that before the inauguration of the successive Administration plates had been prepared for a bond issue to avert the danger of a panic which had already partly spent its force upon this country.

The gentleman holds up his hands with amazement at what happened in 1893 and charges it to Democratic rule. He contends that prosperity comes when money comes this way from other countries and that financial adversity follows when money flows out of this country. He forgets what fearful drain was made on the gold of the Treasury in that year. The recent report of the Treasurer of the United States shows that the net exports of gold beyond imports for the year 1892 were $59,081,110. From the same report we learn that from March 1, 1892, to March 1, 1893, there had been drawn from the Treasury of the United States $64,450,444 in gold.

At the time Mr. Cleveland was first inaugurated President there was in gold in the National Treasury $240,029,843; when he vacated that office, in March, 1899, that amount had been increased to $326,700,939. This immense sum of gold in the Treasury at the time Mr. Harrison was inaugurated was reduced to $217,672,948 during his Administration. And this enormous reduction in the amount of gold in the Treasury, according to the gentleman's argument, well explains why it is that so soon following that time the great panic of 1893 was upon this country, due, not to Democratic mismanagement, because nothing had been done, but if chargeable to administration at all, it must be chargeable to the Republican Administration, which had depleted the Treasury and brought on this condition of affairs. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said this afternoon that the prosperity now existing is due to the election of Mr. McKinley, "that the passage of the tariff law reversed the policy of the Democratic party." The gentleman perhaps is not reminded that the tariff law in existence in 1873, during the extraordinary financial depression of that time, which brought sorrow, starvation, and ruin to so many homes, was a Republican tariff. It may be to him as a dream, but the people well know that the McKinley tariff was in existence for over eighteen months after the Cleveland Administration began, and during the worst of the panic. That during that time nothing had been done in legislation except to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, which the Republicans fully indorsed, and which was in line with the legislation now attempted. If tariff legislation is responsible for the panics of 1873 and 1893, it is chargeable directly to the Republican party.

It is now insisted that with the election of Mr. McKinley came prosperity; that any evidences of that kind which may now be seen are due to that cause. Let us inquire into the prosperity that does exist. What is the cause of it? Aside from the increased demand caused by the war at home and abroad and the shortage of crops in other countries there has been no increase in the prices of the products of labor, except that which is produced by the increased production of gold. I am anxious to see that kind of prosperity that will make glad the home of the farmer and laborer and place the farmer, especially, in a position that he can pay off the mortgage on his farm without being compelled to run the bluff on the money lender, as did the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

What will be said to the farmer after the gold standard is permanently fixed? You said to him in 1896 that Democratic supremacy meant cheap money—a depreciated dollar. You will say to him now, You have a dear dollar, the most precious thing on earth, but it is worth 100 cents anywhere." You will say to him, further, if you tell the whole truth, that a dear dollar means lower prices for the products of his farm. But you will doubtless insist that the farmer be content, for what he does receive will be in the dearest money of earth. You must say to him, You are burdened with debts and would receive far more for your toil with a bimetallic standard, and would be enabled to pay much more of the debts which harass you, but you should rejoice in the gold standard. For while you can not pay the incumbrance on your home and remove the shackles of financial bondage from your household, you have the assurance that if you could secure the money it would be sound money and as good as that of any government elsewhere. [Applause.]

I wish at this time to call attention to the statement made on this floor in the Fifty-fourth Congress by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], which shows his interest and that of many others on that side of the House in the producers of the country:

I know of no man whose wall is heard because of the fall in prices of wheat, grain, food, cloth, clothing, and the implements of husbandry and of trade, and all that go to minister to the comfort, the health, and the needs of every man, rich and poor, in his own home, except the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. To my mind the decrease in the cost of the necessities of life and the increase in the wages of labor indicate not depression, but prosperity.

What a compliment is here unwittingly paid to silver advocates. I am proud that I am classed among those who are interested in the prices of farm products. There is no class of laborers more essential to real prosperity than the agriculturists. Make farming prosperous, and all lines of trade and business will succeed. It is the standard of value in business. It is the basic element in trade. Yet no class of business enterprise is more oppressed, and none is less protected by law. What body of farmers has asked for the passage of this bill? Which of them have demanded a provision of law making their debts payable in gold? Who of them desire to be placed in the hands of their creditors and to be required to pay the mortgages on their homes in gold? Have you conferred with the laboring classes of the country? Have they asked you to enlarge the power of the national banks and to retire all kinds of money except gold and supplant the money now in circulation with national-bank notes? Are the producing and laboring classes—the plain people of the country—demanding that the money of the Government shall be retired and the promises to pay of corporations be substituted? Mr. Chairman, I enter my determined protest against this ruthless thrust at their interests and utter disregard for their rights, this movement which is in the interest of bond syndicates and aggregated wealth. [Applause.]

It is proposed to redeem and impound the obligations of the Government which paid the soldiers who saved the Union when it was hanging in the balance. They are to be supplanted by obligations of national banks. It is proposed that gold shall bear the burden of this redemption by exchanging for the outstanding greenbacks the sum of $346,681,016 and in addition thereto be exchangeable for the Treasury notes, silver certificates, and silver dollars now in existence, the sum of $629,445,056, making nearly $1,000,000,000 that must be redeemed in gold sooner or later. Where can the gold be obtained? There was in the Treasury December 12 last, after providing for the gold certificates, $242,060,896.19, which must bear the burden of government and make this redemption.

You observe, therefore, the necessity of issuing bonds under this system. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by this bill to issue bonds whenever he finds it necessary to supply the gold reserve. The iniquity of this scheme, the extraordinary power given to the Secretary, is not equalled by any statute ever made in this country. Is it possible that the people of this free Government are ready to vest such absolute power in one man?

I do not believe that such consent will be given. I denounce any such attempt as an infringement upon the rights of the people. [Applause.]

I object to this bill because it is in the interests of a favored class and against the people; because it fixes the single gold standard, and makes all obligations, public and private, payable in gold; because it will retire all Government paper money and the silver dollar from circulation in the end, and, as stated by gentlemen on the other side, the promoters of this scheme will be better pleased the sooner it is accomplished; because it makes necessary the issuance of bonds to redeem the outstanding currency, and fastens a burden upon future generations which can not be met by this one; because it places the power of the issuance of bonds in one person; because no bill should ever become a law which in time of peace adds to the bonded indebtedness of the country; because it gives additional power to national banks in controlling the circulating medium of the country, and because it is in direct opposition to the best interests of the Republic.

I will therefore record my vote against it, with sincere regret that there are not enough votes to defeat this outrageous measure. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBB, Mr. Chairman, from a declaration in 1893 that "the American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetalism and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money;" from a declaration in the last national platform of that party in favor of bimetalism, based upon an international agreement, which it promised to use its best efforts to promote, to the purpose now clearly indicated in this bill and openly avowed on that side of the House to abandon in favor of the single gold standard every idea of bimetalism and to disregard and violate every pledge made upon that subject, is a feat in political bad faith and treachery without a parallel in the history of the country. That for which they criticised and denounced Grover Cleveland in 1888—his efforts to demonetize silver—they now applaud and commend. So completely have they changed under the inspiration of the influences, seen and unseen, back of them that the crime of yesterday is the virtue of to-day, and the whole record of the party in the past is admittedly one of mistakes, falsehoods, and insincerity.

The question will very naturally arise in the mind of everyone, What hope is in store for the future from legislation emanating from and passed by the votes of a party self-convicted of so serious and so many offenses? What reliance can be placed in their promises and predictions of the results which are to be the outgrowth of and to flow from the policies which they now and here crystallize into law, but which before they never dared to publicly avow?

While the bill which we are now considering removes the last feeble support which silver had in legislation or legal construction, it goes far beyond the question of bimetalism; it goes far beyond the question of the coinage of silver as money of redemption or final account at the ratio of 16 to 1 or any other ratio. It is a bill in opposition to which everyone can well afford to stand who is opposed to the contraction of the currency, to the retirement of the greenbacks, and to the surrendering to the national banks the power and control of the Government over the currency of the country. It is a bill which is the culmination of the thought and design of those who in the past and who now oppose the free coinage of silver. It is a bill which has concentrated within its few brief pages the purpose of the gold conspirators of the world—the subjugation of the masses to the power of money. The question of morals, the question of right and justice and good faith, have no place in it.

What would Blaine, that great leader of the Republican party, have said of such a measure? He would have said as he did in the Senate of the United States on February 7, 1878:

It is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results that will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands. * * * If, therefore, silver has been demonetized, I am in favor of remonetizing it.

But you say by your bill, "If silver has not been demonetized, let us demonetize it," thereby completing and crowning the infamy of 1873. By laws, cumulative, I may say, you strip it of the qualities of standard money. Having once demonetized it, to make doubly sure you demonetize it again, and by law you propose to do that which you have heretofore done in defiance of law. You legislate it out of the contract between the Government and the creditors of the country where it has heretofore been construed out; you forbid that the bondholder shall be required to take that which he expressly agreed to take, and which the law at the time the bonds were purchased provided he should take in payment of his bond—either gold or silver coin of the United States. You make the whole superstructure of credit money and all the bonds and every other obligation rest on gold and gold alone.

You make the silver dollar redeemable in gold. In other words, you narrow the base and widen and enlarge the superstructure.

You weaken the foundation, already weak, and add on another story or two—for the purpose, you say, of strengthening the building of sound money. The Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, and the United States notes shall be redeemed in gold coin; the silver certificates are to be redeemed in accordance with existing law; but the silver dollars, having been paid out for silver certificates, are in turn presented and gold demanded in exchange, and gold is promptly delivered. Gold coin, as defined in section 1 of the bill, is the sole and only standard, the only full, complete, and unqualified redeemer of obligations, both public and private.

Notwithstanding the latitude allowed for construction in some other parts of the bill, and its elasticity and flexibility, I may say, to meet certain emergencies and in the end accomplish the general purpose of surrendering the functions of the Government with respect to the currency of the country to the national banks, there is left no room for doubt as to this proposition, for it is expressly provided in section 2:

Sec. 2. That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

The United States notes or greenbacks, amounting to $346,681,016, and the Treasury notes outstanding, amounting to $91,167,280, you propose to retire. You redeem them in gold and then hold them locked up or impounded in the Treasury until some magnanimous banker with a heart bleeding for his country comes along and offers you gold for them. But still some of you have the boldness to assert that the withdrawal from circulation of this sum, amounting in the aggregate to $437,848,296, and the practical burial of it in the United States Treasury, will not contract the currency and will not injuriously affect business. I can not agree with you and do not believe experience will verify your predictions. That it is the policy of the supporters of this bill and one of the purposes of the measure to retire the greenbacks can not be questioned or denied. Hon. Maurice L. Muhleman, of the United States subtreasury of New York, in an article in the May number, 1899, of a monthly magazine called "Money," published in New York, has clearly set forth the intention and design on the part of those who control the machinery of the Republican party. He said:

The general consensus of opinion of those who have given the subject of currency reform serious attention is that the continued use of United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," as an important element in our monetary system is dangerous. This opinion is held not only by bankers, as Mr. Bryan and others would have us believe, but by many men who have absolutely no personal interest to serve except the ultimate improvement of the nation's money.

It is true that, thus far, the preponderance of opinion favors only the conservative measure, which I have advocated for years, of suspending the reissue of Government notes once redeemed in gold, except when gold is again tendered for them; but this measure not only admits the danger involved in the continuance of the present status of the notes, but foreshadows their ultimate withdrawal or radical rehabilitation. So strong is the sentiment that some step must be taken to remove, in part at least, the danger to our entire system, that the Republican caucus committee appears to have concluded that their party must in the near future declare itself and, following the President's repeated recommendation, has outlined a proposition which may possibly become law before the Presidential campaign of 1900.

When it is borne in mind how much of sentiment has existed among Republicans for the old "greenback," it must be conceded that this is a step forward; and if it be further borne in mind that the Coinage Committee of the last House of Representatives recommended in section 9 of its bill the ultimate retirement of all "greenbacks," the general policy is unmistakably foreshadowed.

Yes; this is the unmistakable purpose. What, then, is to take the place of this large sum of money which is to be withdrawn from circulation? The redemption fund is not to be diminished, and other large sums are to be held in the Treasury as a reserve. Must it not necessarily follow that this deficiency must be supplied either by a largely increased bank circulation or by gold purchased, from those who, in this and European countries, own and control it, by the sale of bonds of our Government? We must therefore meet the conditions which this bill will impose if enacted into law, all of which are evils, either of a contraction of the currency or of an increased bonded indebtedness or of a bank currency made to depend upon the whim and caprice and selfishness of the national banker. I am opposed to this bill, Mr. Chairman, because of the evil provisions which it contains separately and collectively. To give to the Secretary of the Treasury, as this bill does, the power, without limitation and at his own discretion and in his own judgment, to issue and sell bonds of the Government is a power greater than should be given a king, a power greater than should be given any man.

To give to the national banks the power and control over the currency of the country, the power to expand or contract it at pleasure as suits their interests, is too great a power to place in the hands of any man or any men or any corporation or combination of corporations. I commend to the consideration of this House and the country the words of warning of that great Missourian, Thomas H. Benton, in that other and historic struggle between the people and the old United States Bank. They are not inappropriate and inapplicable to the pending bill and present discussion. He said:

It is too great a power to be trusted to any banking company whatever, or to any authority but the highest and most responsible known to our form of government.

The Government itself ceases to be independent, it ceases to be safe, when the national currency is at the will of a company.

The Government can undertake no great enterprise, neither of war nor peace, without the consent and cooperation of this company; it can not count its revenues for six months ahead without referring to the action of this company—its friendship or its enmity, its convenience or its opposition—to see how far that company will permit money to be scarce or to be plentiful; how far it will let the money system go on regularly or throw it into disorder; how far it will suit the interests or policy of that company to create a tempest or suffer a calm in the moneyed ocean. The people are not safe when such a company has such a power. The temptation is too great, the opportunity too easy to put up and put down prices; to make or break fortunes; to bring the whole community on its knees to the Neptune who presides over the flux and reflux of paper. All property is at their mercy.

The price of real estate, of every growing crop, of every staple article in the market is at their command. Stocks are their playthings, their gambling theater, on which they gamble daily with as little secrecy and as little morality and far more mischief to fortunes than common gamblers carry on their operations.

Mr. Chairman, is not the evil of allowing those who deal in money, who sell the use of money, control the character and supply of money far greater than the evil of allowing those who deal in any article of consumption by combinations to control or limit the output, the supply, and the price of that article? If it is wrong and injurious to the public for the dealer in coal or sugar or the manufacturers of iron or steel or other articles of consumption by combinations to limit the supply or output for the purpose of relatively increasing the demand and thereby increasing prices, are not the consequences far more serious and the wrong far greater and far-reaching when it is made possible for those who deal in money and speculate upon the credit of the country by any kind of manipulation to in any way affect its character or quantity, thereby affecting the price of every article of consumption?

If trusts are inimical to the best interests of the country, which seek to control and regulate the price of commodities, and if legislation should be enacted to destroy them, why, by this initial measure, House bill No. 1, authorize and render possible a greater trust than all the others—the money trust? Why throw around it the protection and encouragement of legislative sanction?

It is convincing evidence to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party is no more sincere in its protestation against trusts than it was in its declarations in favor of bimetallism. The Republican party has been kept in control of the Government by the money power, and those of you who now propose to pass this bill are faithfully serving your masters. Notwithstanding it is denied to the States in the organic law the authority to pass any law violating the obligation of contracts, and notwithstanding this rule was, in the early part of the history of our country, held to apply to the Federal Government as well, you here, by express legislative provision, authorize the creditor class to violate every contract made between it and the Government for the last quarter of a century.

Mr. Chairman, I protest against the passage of this bill, and in doing so I record my own judgment and give expression to the opinion of a vast majority of the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest and attention to the debate that has taken place on this important measure, and especially to the remarks of the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber who are responsible for its introduction and who advocate its passage. I had and still have a sincere desire to be enlightened both as to the necessity for its immediate enactment and the benefits to be derived under it.

But after all that has been said, Mr. Chairman, I must confess a confusion of ideas respecting this bill; that is, in so far as I am to believe all that has been said about it by those who are clamoring for its enactment. Some of you contend that it is but a declaration of existing law, of law that has been in existence and in force for more than a quarter of a century, with perhaps some slight amendment with reference to national banks, while others assert that it is the redemption of the pledges of the Republican party to establish the gold standard and make every dollar of the country as good as gold. Others content themselves with fulsome eulogy of Mr. McKinley and shameless denunciation of Mr. Bryan.

I am sorry for this latter, because it is neither edifying nor courteous. Mr. Bryan treats all who differ with him with courtesy and consideration. He is ever the gentleman, dignified and pure, and I am only sorry that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] has not been benefited by the close personal contact with him which he the other day avowed with so much candor and vehemence. And, as he has otherwise displayed such an aptitude for observation, I am persuaded that the lantern which he said he used to illuminate his vision of that great man must have been of that variety of manufacture which supplies the needs of the burglar or the midnight assassin without too much disclosing his identity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Bryan needs no defense by me or, indeed, by any other gentleman on this side of the Chamber. The magic of his name will at all times rally behind him millions, like himself, of unbought and unbuyable American citizens. And since I come to speak of it, Mr. Chairman, I might as well remark in passing that perhaps the apparition of Bryan still at the head of the great army of voters, with his battle-scarred banner yet flung to the breeze, may be the apology for the hasty manner in which this bill is to be passed and fastened upon the country. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the question before this House is not the free coinage of silver, as one might suppose it to be from the fact that that question has been made to bear the brunt of the argument by our enthusiastic friends on the other side of this Chamber. Much as we would enjoy the privilege of registering our loyalty to free silver, we will not be allowed to do so when we come to vote on this bill. Neither does it relate solely to the standard, as well argued by my friend from New York, Mr. SULZER, and other gentlemen on this floor. The full import and significance of its provisions, though short and simple as they appear, may never be fully understood until they stand forth in all their nakedness in the light of future experience. Even its advocates, while professing a blind faith in its benevolent origin, do not undertake to say with any degree of certainty or probability what may be its results.

Mr. Chairman, it is a serious matter to indict the representatives of a great political party as being the subservient tools of designing and selfish interests, and so it is but charitable to suppose that the advocates of this bill are in the main sincere in their professed belief that it will promote the public good.

The so-called financiers, the large bankers of the country, have so long shaped the policies and molded the legislation of the Republican party—on the money question at least—under the idea that no one could speak advisedly or intelligently upon that topic save those who are at the head of great moneyed institutions, enlivening their teachings and concealing their purposes in such cant and catchy phrases as “sound money,” “one hundred cents in the dollar,” “repudiations,” etc., that it is small wonder that their deluded and misguided servants, believing themselves and the people to be the beneficiaries of their thought and plans, though they are in truth but the mortgaged product, follow blindly and with perfect faith in the execution of the half-concealed purposes of the master minds.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind the tenacity of this trust in the bondholders and money brokers is but the manifestation of that spirit of fanaticism common to mankind and so aptly described by the Irish poet in delineating the sentiment that characterized the followers of “The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan” in “Lalla Rookh,” when, notwithstanding pending, threatened, and apparent dangers, they followed him to the doom prepared and executed by his own hand because, it was said, they believed him.

That the lover may
Distrust the look that steals his heart away;
The child may cease to think it can play
With heaven's rainbow; alchemists may doubt
The shining gold their crucible gives out;
But faith, fanatic faith, once wedded fast,
Hugs the delusive falsehood to the last.

Our prayer is, Mr. Chairman, that when the great commercial interests of this country are manacled with the single gold standard and contracted currency, and the purposes of its authors are unveiled in the light of experience, it may not witness the death of either liberty or hope, but that sufficient valiant and patriotic spirits may be found to march against its strongholds under the banners of Democracy and in the battles of ballots elect faithful public servants and write another emancipation proclamation for the people in the statutes of the country. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, while we thus credit the execution of this potential direction with humanitarian considerations, we would be derelict in our duty should we fail to subject to the severest scrutiny the origin, purpose, and effect of this proposed legislation. The beneficiaries of this measure care little for the consistency of those who are now falling over themselves to lend it their support. And from the facility with which they change convictions on important subjects, it appears that they care little themselves. Neither are they concerned with the character or value of the arguments by which their well-considered anticipations are about to be realized. On the contrary, secure in the enjoyment of present opportunity, they have simply contented themselves with securing the music hall and revising the programme. I say revising, Mr. Chairman, for no party in its official utterances has ever yet proposed to go the length of this measure.

The Republican party in its platform never proposed such a revolution in our financial system, but, on the contrary, they pledged the country that until international bimetalism could be secured the existing gold standard should be maintained.

The existing condition of things is to be changed, radically changed, by this bill. Hence I say that the beneficiaries of this measure have revised the programme. But they have left the performers to their own devices as to the character of the short entertainment which is to be afforded the country in this debate.

And what is that program, Mr. Chairman? In the first place this bill—and I do not now propose to discuss it in detail—is a proposition of the bankers agreed upon in advance and to be enacted in this hasty manner without being considered by a regularly constituted and standing committee in that judicious deliberation which should characterize all legislation of such far-reaching importance, and where calm and careful analysis would develop all of its objectionable features and suggest proper remedies for defects.

In acting as you are with this bill you expose yourselves to one or the other of two just criticisms, and that is that you either arrogate to yourselves all wisdom and scorn suggestions, which is folly, or you fear your bill can not successfully undergo deliberate scrutiny, which is an indisputable evidence of bad faith and perfidy. You can not plead the excuse of immediate and pressing necessity, for you have stood here on this floor for hours felicitating and congratulating yourselves upon an overflowing Treasury and restored confidence. When you thus confess no necessity for this bill you challenge a suspicion that your motives in its enactment may not be to promote the public weal.

The first and second section of the proposed act involves not only a change in the present contracts evidencing the liabilities of the nation, the State, the municipality, the corporation, and the individual; not alone do they involve the powers conferred by the organic law; but they are so pregnant with possibilities of evil and distress that they excite, alarm, and challenge the most earnest attention of the country. Mr. Chairman, these obligations are enormous. We can only approximately estimate their proportions. That they should thus be made payable in gold places upon some one the obligation of furnishing the gold. It follows as a necessary sequence that all other moneys issued or provided for by the Government must be made redeemable or interchangeable with gold, which is the same thing, or the single gold standard as it is now defined by the Republican party could not survive its enactment long enough for explanation.

The act thus creates an enormously increased demand for the circulation or accumulation of gold, not alone as sponsor for silver and the paper currency, but as a guaranty of that vast system of credit which a restricted money volume is most largely responsible for. This places upon the Government a most serious and onerous obligation. May we not discern some politics in this as well as dangers? At present we have several kinds of legal-tender money—silver as well as different forms of paper currency.

Let us remember that in the campaign of 1896 threats were made that if Mr. Bryan was elected panics would ensue, entailing dire distress on the people in locking up capital and retiring money from circulation. With the control the Government then had over the finances, I believed those things impossible, and yet we all know that the national banks by refusing loans and writing gold payments in the notes for the loans they did advance were able to stimulate a genuine, though false, alarm throughout the country, and thus contribute a great deal toward the election of Mr. McKinley.

Do you doubt that the threat of exactions of gold payments in all the vast multiplicity of business transactions among the common people, which the passage of this bill will not only make possible but effective, will lead them to discredit or discount all other forms of money, and thus constitute a continuous demand among the people themselves upon an imperiled Treasury, make them innocent but potential agencies to exact tribute from the Government in a forced issue of bonds? There is no necessity for this.

National honor does not demand it. We all know the fact, as it is recent history, that even to maintain the present existing redeemable quality of our currency that it plunged the nation millions and millions of dollars further in debt in the shape of bonds. And now without necessity it is blind and besotted folly to take gratuitously upon ourselves further obligations. It is apparent that to increase the demand for gold will benefit some one. Whom? The gold syndicate who profited in the bountiful harvests in the dark days of Mr. Cleveland's Administration.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind there is no higher standard of public morality than to fear the Lord and keep his commandments, obey the law and execute our obligations according to our promise or contract. It can not be denied that all our obligations, both public and private, except as otherwise stipulated in the contract, were at the time they were executed and are now dischargeable in the coin of the Constitution—the coin of the contract, which any court governed and constrained by an oath of office and the law of the case would enforce without any sort of question.

And when it is remembered that the great moneyed syndicates, in a time of greatest depression, were willing—nay, eager and anxious—to take our bonds and pay for them in gold at par, when they were absolutely refused the condition of repayment in gold, thus making it doubly impressive upon them that the Government could, would, or might pay in silver, and which they did take in any quantity and subsequently sold upon the market at a premium, we are led to wonder at the anatomical construction of those people who yet assure us that silver, when recognized by the Government as money, in such form is a debased metal; who talk about bankruptcy and repudiation and clamor for an increased demand for gold.

But, Mr. Chairman, as grotesque and illogical as they appear, they pale into insignificance in contemplation of the spectacle of two such pioneers in American thought and leadership as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], now waltzing upon the stage in the dress suit of gold bonds.

My colleague [Mr. COX] and other gentlemen in their speeches have called attention to the opinion of these gentlemen of such a measure proposed in the bygone history of this country, too recently uttered to be forgotten by the country or by the gentlemen themselves; and their opinions against the issue of gold bonds were too pronounced and too well fortified to be the result of hasty or ill-advised conclusions. Under these circumstances we had the right to indulge the hope that they, too, would not mount on the wings of an alleged general prosperity and soar beyond the range of our finite comprehension.

We had the right to expect that they who cheered on the rest and boasted no "habitation in ancient graveyards" would at least explain to us why a Government coin bond sold at par in a time of greatest depression can not continue to find a gracious market, should necessity so require, when, if they are to be believed, nature bursts with plenty and capital is on the hunt of investment with a search warrant. Under such circumstances, why not leave the silver and silver certificates to circulate on their own merits among that vast majority of the people who have no means, capacity, or inclination to organize vast moneyed institutions to traffic in gold? Why thus burden the already overstrained obligations of gold in its migratory world's service with the additional weight of this large volume of silver, as well as other mountains of debts, unless it be to promote the traffic therein?

To those who are not drunk with the false glamor of the world's best dollar and for that reason discredit their own, and who are not biased by the friendship of those who extend it but to become their masters, the explanation is apparent that the retirement of the greenbacks and Treasury notes will promote the interest of the national-bank currency while the silver and silver certificates will serve the purposes of the gold brokers and bond syndicate, as they can by this bill be made to construct the endless chain that afforded them such boundless opportunities and golden harvests in the dark days of Mr. Cleveland.

Gentlemen talk of parity of money, of the dangers of gold going to a premium if we have the free coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. They forget the fact that any increase in the demand for gold will increase its purchasing power, and any increase in its purchasing power is in itself a premium in precisely the amount of such increase.

The silver dollar to-day will buy as much property as the gold dollar and could perform every service if allowed to do so. The two metals together would form a sufficient base for any volume of paper currency necessary to transact all the business of the country, develop our matchless resources, and make the waste places bloom with beauty and fruition.

Relieve distress, prevent panics, and then afford all the guaranty to those who distrust the stability of our institutions that they are in all good conscience entitled to, by leaving to them the commodity in the gold and silver that would be left to them should the flag of liberty and constitutional government be furled forever and the Constitution be buried itself beneath the crumbling ruins of the fortunes and hopes and aspirations of those who are yet willing to trust their country and have faith in that power that can write in the face of all money it provides the legal-tender quality and make it receivable for taxes and all other demands.

You flatter yourselves that you have kept all the money on a parity and prevented a premium on gold, which you say you are going to further provide against by the passage of this bill. May the Lord deliver our country from your misguided zeal and blundering incapacity. May He remove that plaster phrase, "one hundred cents in the dollar," which you have so long worn over your eyes that you can not see the national honor, in order that you may observe the fluctuating values in the vast property interests that are the true base from which to make our reckonings on the premium.

When Cleveland sold the two hundred and sixty-odd millions of dollars in bonds to maintain the gold standard, he paid a premium on gold in that transaction in a sum precisely the amount the people will have to pay in interest and in premiums if purchased before maturity in order to retire the bonds. And yet you all can not see this, or will not see it, because none of you have even yet been able to discover that there is any difference in the actual number of cents in a gold dollar and the actual number of cents in a silver dollar. And lest you might discover that there is some difference, you are preparing to legislate against it. You thus lose sight of the value of the 100 cents in considering the number—you sacrifice substance for form. The money broker knows it, and no doubt laughs at you while he encourages your stupidity.

On February 8, 1895, in his message to Congress communicating his contract with the gold syndicate, President Cleveland made the following statement:

The privilege is especially reserved to the Government to substitute at par, within ten days from this date, in lieu of the 4 per cent coin bonds other bonds payable in gold and bearing only 3 per cent interest, if the issue of the same should in the meantime be authorized by the Congress. The arrangement thus completed, which after careful inquiry appears, in present circumstances and considering all the objects desired, to be the best attainable, develops such a difference in the estimation of investors between bonds made payable in gold in favor of the latter as is represented by three-fourths of a cent in annual interest. In the agreement just concluded the annual saving to the Government in interest if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege reserved would be $59,152, amounting in thirty years, or at the maturity of the coin bonds, to $16,174,770.

This is the proposition which patriotic Republicans then denounced and joined with Democrats in preventing, because they saw then the great vortex of debt it opened up in compelling the Government to pay gold, and hung back in terror from the danger which it presaged. Yet now, forsooth, because crops have been good for a year or two, with balances of trade in our favor, and because gold has taken a little spurt in increased production, and because extraordinary markets have been opened up in consequence of foreign wars, causes all of which are transitory in their nature and which may resolve themselves into similitudes of the pleasure which the poet described when he wrote the following lines—

Pleasures are like poppies spread,
You grasp the flower, its bloom is shed;
Or, like the snow fall in the river,
A moment white, then gone forever;
Or like the rainbow's lovely form,
Evanishing amidst the storm;
Or like the borealis race
That flits ere you can point its place—you want to darken the people's hope and mortgage their future, and for what? Who has demanded this reckless folly? If gold was worth 1 per cent more than silver in 1895, is it not worth as much more now, though there is no one now demanding or able to exact the difference? What debt are you paying when you thus, without any apparent consideration or conscience, give to the bondholders the 1 per cent on the $1,046,049,020 which, according to the tables of the Bureau of Statistics, the Government owed in October, 1899? Is it a public or a private debt? You no longer regard the public contracts. Why should you not now pause in an awakened conscience and repudiate your private ones? It would be amusing, if it was not pitiful, to hear you prate of national honor. Does it consist in giving away the nation's substance? Is it secured by levying grievous burdens in unnecessary taxation upon those who trusted you? Do you reflect it when you thus gamble upon the hazard of future prosperity?

There is some comfort in the reflection that you will be called to account at no very distant day for the iniquitous work that you are about to perpetrate. You provide for an increase of reserves to be kept in the Treasury, thus at once contracting the currency. You provide for the retirement of the greenbacks and Treasury notes, which will be a further and an additional contraction. You increase the privileges of national banks and reduce taxation on them. You provide them with power to increase or contract their circulation at will, which inevitably will be used to augment their profits and impose hardships, poverty, and ruin upon the people, and yet you say you are the guardians of the public faith and are giving to the people the best money in the world. Let the people judge of these things when the issues are submitted to them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STANLEY W. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I have sought the privileges of this floor for a very few minutes, not that I hope to add anything to what has been so ably presented on both sides of this House, but to suggest a few reasons why I am opposed to the passage of this bill.

I have listened with close attention to the able arguments on this side of the House, and I am fully convinced that the conclusion I have come to is fully warranted. It has thus far developed in the discussion of this question that there are a certain few Democrats who feel compelled to vote for this measure. From their statements made on this floor, I for one am willing to concede them the right, and, under the circumstances of each particular case, honor them for it. They have here asserted that this question was before their people in the most emphatic form; that upon the stump, in the public press, and in private conversation, the most solemn and positive pledges were made to support any measure that might be proposed to establish the gold standard.

Again, if we are to believe the public press and statements made upon this floor, there are a few other Democrats who have lost faith in the issue of the free coinage of silver in the ratio of 16 to 1, but yet who are not willing to concede any possible measure that might be proposed to change the present financial laws of the country. These Democrats are opposed to the passage of this bill.

Our friends upon the other side have poured forth volumes of oratory proclaiming the era of good times and sound money. If prosperity is upon us and we are under the gold standard, why disturb the relation? We are told that in three years gold has poured into our Treasury by the hundreds of millions; that each kind of money is as good as every other kind of money. If we have an abundance of good money, why hazard a change? If your propositions are true, it is reckless to risk such a vital transformation.

This is a Republican measure. If it passes, as I believe it will, to them we will accord honor or opprobrium as the case may be. They have rallied their forces to a man. Each individual has stifled his objections to its parts and swallowed the whole. If they have reached the fruition of their hopes, I would not detract from their joy. But, in the event of failure of their plans, then will come the day of reckoning. As they will glory in their triumphs, so must they suffer when snags and pitfalls beset their pathway. This measure may be a success, but have they counted well the awful cost of a mistake of judgment?

But why so much haste in passing this bill—sweeping aside all precedents, rushing on to a fixed day, a fixed purpose? The bill must be passed. Why so impetuous? Not even one day could be spared, not even one day's postponement, in which to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the death of the Father of our Country!

I am against this bill because it sweeps aside greenbacks, the Treasury notes, and silver dollars, hundreds of millions, and substitutes an experiment. It is not known that the national banks will take out the full circulation offered by the terms of this bill.

It is assumed that they will, but who will vouch for it? Suppose it transpires when this bill is in full operation that the national banks decline to accept the privileges offered. What then results? A contraction of the currency to the extent of hundreds of millions! Would this not be a calamity? Congress would be immediately compelled to revise the system proposed, and in the meantime great crises might be upon us. I see no impropriety in any Gold Democrat voting against this measure. If all our money is now on a parity, a simple declaration that we are on the single standard ought to suffice.

Why ought we not take up other matters of more pressing necessity? The President in his annual message has something to say about trusts. Does the President expect his party to champion the attack upon the trusts who are laying their hands on the pocketbooks of the people? I apprehend not. Is it not true that the President's closest friend in Ohio, the Chairman of the Republican national committee, has already stood forth as the apologist of the trusts? Is it not true that his other close friend, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, has already intimated in this debate, that the trusts can not be reached; that no legislation is possible that will remedy the evils complained of? This proposition can not be true. Let us at all events take up the subject at once. Our people are demanding relief, and relief should be afforded. Let us proceed to this question, and ascertain at least if our people must continue to be robbed by concerns that combine, for profit, to the extent of scores of millions. Instead of 20 cents, the good housewives of our country now pay 40 cents for a broom with which to sweep out their kitchens.

Hours might be consumed in presenting the iniquities that have recently arisen through these enormous combinations of capital. To this vital question should we now devote ourselves instead of legislating upon a question which must be practically settled if, as our friends on the other side assert, we are living under the gold standard at the present hour. Let well enough alone and proceed at once to more urgent measures, checkmating the ravages and greed of the all-powerful trusts of the country, and our people will be truly grateful. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, having listened attentively to this debate for the past five days, I am firmly of the opinion that nothing has been said, or will hereafter be said, by any gentleman on this side that will cause any member of the majority party on this floor to change his action. In view of this conclusion I would, under ordinary circumstances, pursue the course I had marked out for myself and be content to remain in my seat in silence. But when I contemplate the distressing consequences and conditions that must inevitably follow the passage of the pending bill, believing, as I do, that it is laden with every phase of national and individual disaster and distress, I can not refrain from entering my emphatic, vigorous, and solemn protest.

I have noted with surprise and astonishment the strangely inharmonious and wholly conflicting positions taken by some of the distinguished leaders who have spoken in advocacy of this harsh, unjust, oppressive, and monstrous measure. Beginning with the President's message and running through every speech made on that side, we have had presented to us, in the most gorgeous hues of word painting, the assumed fact that "the country is in a condition of unusual prosperity," which the gentlemen, with more arrogance than reason, insist is due to the fact that we have had the single gold standard in practical operation for the past thirty years.

I would be glad if some one on that side would tell us what they mean by "the country" and point to the evidences of this phenomenal prosperity of which they speak. As I understand it, one is said to be in a prosperous condition when he can by faithful and energetic exertion earn something in excess of the amount required, economically expended, to support himself and his family. A man may be prosperous and be in debt, but when indebted, he can in the course of time, under prosperous conditions, discharge, or at least reduce, his indebtedness.

This is also true of a nation. And yet, notwithstanding this unprecedented prosperity, which we are told swept over the country like a tidal wave of the deep after "confidence was restored" in 1873, and which has abided with us during all the years since, except during Mr. Cleveland's Administration, we have heard in this debate the startling and astounding admission of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the people of this highly favored land still have fastened upon them an indebtedness, quoting his exact words, "on contracts made since 1870, amounting to fifty or seventy-five billions of dollars, and contracted upon the present basis."

The gentleman who uttered these words has passed that period of life when the exuberance of youth might lead him to extravagance of speech, and therefore his statement should cause you on that side of this Chamber to pause and reflect, provided you have not completely surrendered to the money power of the country.

The highest reliable estimate places our population at about 75,000,000. If the maximum indebtedness stated by the gentleman from Illinois is reliable, we are confronted with the alarming condition that the average indebtedness of every citizen of the United States, regardless of age and sex, is $1,000. At the general election held in 1896 the total vote cast for all the candidates for the Presidency was 13,923,398; and if this colossal debt were prorated equally among them, it would make an average indebtedness of $5,336.70 for every man who voted at that election—for every adult male citizen of the United States.

With these facts asserted and contended for, gentlemen who advocate the enactment of this odious and infamous bill seek to chloroform the intelligent judgment of the masses of our country by their siren song of prosperity, while the people are being further plundered and robbed of $900,000,000 in obedience to the arbitrary demands of the banks and trusts that furnished the Republican party the sinews of war with which to wage "The first battle."

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] challenges us to refer to a single statement made by Democrats in 1896 which subsequent events has proven to be true, and without waiting for a reply satisfies himself and his admiring friends by saying we can not do so. In this conclusion he is mistaken. We said in 1896 that an increase of the volume of money in the channels of trade would cause rising prices and better wages and bring better times.

You conclusively admit this to be true by your repeated arguments on this floor based on the discovery of the Klondike, from which we have drawn large quantities of gold, and the fact that gold has come to us from other nations by reason of trade balances being in our favor, thus increasing the volume of our basic money. Your speeches are admissions that the quantitative theory of finance contended for by Democrats is a correct principle.

Again, we took the position and announced it everywhere that your St. Louis platform was a snare, a deception, a delusion, and a fraud, by which you hoped to deceive the voter; we said you would not make an honest effort to secure international bimetalism; we charged that you were at heart in league and sympathy with and under the domination of the plutocrats and capitalists of the nation, and that you would destroy the last hope of silver coinage, if in your power to do so, if you were intrusted with the reins of government.

I charge now that your attitude and conduct on this floor is a plea of guilty to each of the counts in the indictment. The mantle of hypocrisy has been carefully laid away for future use, and you now propose to "more securely establish the single gold standard," retire and practically cancel and destroy all the paper and silver money, aggregating some $800,000,000, and make the whole business and commerce of the country dependent upon gold.

By taking out of circulation, as this bill will do, about $800,000,000, you, in effect, add just that sum to the already stupendous indebtedness of the toilers and producers of our nation, reduce the level of prices of commodities and of labor, and place that amount to the credit of the bondholders, millionaires, and trusts which have been fostered and created under the policies of your unhallowed Administration.

With a record showing your every pledge violated, your vows broken, and the confidence of the people betrayed; with a colossal indebtedness that stifles the comprehension of man hanging over us; with all our great industries held in the grasp and control of the trusts you have inflicted upon us, you unblushingly say in the American Congress, in the language used by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a few days ago, and indorsed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to-day, "We intend to enact this law and make it impossible for you to repeal it for at least eight years to come, unless death shall intervene" in the Senate, thereby making it possible for the Democratic party to gain control of that body.

Ah, gentlemen, if the passage of this bill is right—if you believe you are doing the will of your constituents—why hedge this measure about with such iron-clad safeguards as to make it impossible for the American people, if they see proper to do so, to amend or repeal it? If you are conscientious in this matter and feel that you are truly voicing the sentiments of your people, then, in the name of all that is right, I ask you, why are you afraid to submit your action to the sober judgment of an enlightened people for their approval? Why make it impossible for the plain people of the United States to pass in judgment upon the acts of their servants?

Why "burn the bridges behind you," unless, indeed, your consciences "have made cowards of you all" and you fear you will be overtaken by a justly indignant and incensed people, and, amid the execrations and anathemas of an enraged nation, you will be hurled from place and power forever? You say you will pass this bill, and we, in the name of the debt-burdened and oppressed producers and wage-earners of our country, defy you. If you had had the courage to attempt its passage two years ago the majority would now be on this side of this Hall.

Pass it and I venture the statement that more Democrats will vote in the next Congress than will answer to the roll call at this session. Has the imperial policy of the present national Administration so frenzied your brain and intoxicated your judgment that you dare hurl defiance at a free people whose servants you are? Do you feel so secure in your power and disposition to intimidate the American voter that you no longer respect that great tribunal of final resort, the intelligent will of a free people?

I say to you that the shackles you are forging to-day and which you will fasten for a time upon us will be broken. The people of this country will rise in the strength of their sovereign manhood, break these fetters of gold, and smite their oppressors. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the principle of bimetalism is a living principle. No action of a mere partisan majority can smother it into lifelessness. The Republican party may thwart our desires and trample upon the sacred interests of the people for a season, but "time at last sets all things even." It can make no grave so deep or no sepulcher so strong as to permanently imprison the expressed will of thirteen and a half millions of people. In 1900 the united forces of bimetalism will move forward in solid phalanx to avenge the grievous wrong you are now about to perpetrate.

Back of us we will have the unqualified indorsement and approval of every prominent man in the Republican party since the days of the immortal Lincoln, including the distinguished gentleman who assists Mr. HANNA in administering the affairs of Government. To sustain us in our convictions and guide us aright we have the light of experience of more than a hundred years of our nation's life. We point with pride to the fact that for one hundred and eighty-six years prior to 1873 the commercial ratio of silver to gold was never as high as 16 to 1, except during a part of three years in the early part of this century, as will appear from an examination of tables contained in the annual report of the Director of the Mint for the year 1898.

During all the years embraced in these tables the value of the bullion contained in a silver dollar, as a mere commodity in the open markets of the world, was worth more than $1 in gold, as will appear from the following table, taken from the report above referred to, covering the period from 1837 to 1873.

Bullion value of 371.25 grains of pure silver at the annual average price of silver each year from 1837-1898.

Year.	Value.	Year.	Value.	Year.	Value.	Year.	Value.

* Nine months.

The total production of gold and silver in the world since the discovery of America is as follows: Total gold production, 446,017,990 fine ounces, of the coining value of $9,220,012,100; total silver production, 8,351,339,167 fine ounces, of the coining value of $10,797,685,200.

Thus it will be seen that the ratio of production of silver and gold is practically the same as the legal ratio for which we contend. Indeed, it seems that the Creator, in His wisdom, has so deposited the precious metals in the hidden recesses of the mountain side that the genius and cupidity of man can only bring them forth in about the ratio of 16 to 1.

That silver has depreciated since 1873 none will deny. That this condition is due to hostile and unfriendly legislation an inspection of the tables referred to by me will make so clear that no sane person will controvert the proposition. By destroying the demand for silver for monetary use you destroyed its value. By again creating an unlimited demand for silver its value would be restored.

Gentlemen say we dare not longer advocate 16 to 1. They mistake us. We do advocate the free coinage of silver and gold at 16 to 1, and never entertained a thought of changing from it. We stand to-day on the platform and for the principles we advocated and supported in 1896; and, gentlemen, in 1900, 8,000,000 voters of the United States will follow the banner of Democracy, upon which will be inscribed, "Free coinage of silver and gold at 16 to 1," and with undiminished confidence in the wisdom of our declaration and with increased faith and trust in our peerless leader, that banner will be borne aloft to victory by the gallant statesman of Nebraska, William J. Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, the standard of value is that which the intelligence and experience of the commercial world has made it.

Government may make this or that a legal tender for the purpose of paying debts, but it does not thereby impart or create value. An ounce of gold in junk in the pocket of the man who is the farthest removed from civilization, if it is of equal fineness, possesses exactly the same value as any other ounce of gold with the stamp of the most powerful nation of earth upon it. Gold uncoined has within and of itself all the value it has when minted. Its value is the same in junk or money. [Applause on the Republican side.] The party to which I belong declared in its last national platform in favor of the gold standard. Its opponents contended for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

On the issue presented men aligned themselves and fought the fiercest political campaign in our history, and we won. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Duty, honor, and the confidence reposed in us by that mighty army of Democrats, the brain of the party in the North, who gave us their earnest, active support, demand that we write in statute that which we promised to maintain, so that the world may know that until the Republican party is overwhelmed and defeated in both the executive and legislative branches of the Government every dollar the wage-earner receives shall be equal in purchasing power to the best dollar under our flag and of the same value at home and abroad. To this extent I am earnestly in favor of the bill before the House. Whether it is in all other respects the best that could be formulated I am not prepared to say.

Whether the Government should remain in business as a banker it would be idle here and now to discuss.

I consider the pending measure, in some respects the most important that ever came before the American Congress. A failure on our part to say to the world by statute enactment that this people are for the gold standard would be a betrayal of confidence and neglect of duty which might in the chapter of political accidents make it possible for the advocates of cheap money to destroy our national credit, ruin the industries of our country, bankrupt our business men, and deprive the laborer of an opportunity to earn his means of support.

It is not my purpose to enter into an academic discussion of the subject. The solicitude which our friends on the other side of the Chamber profess for the toilers, as they are pleased to call them, has induced me to make some suggestions and to offer what seems to me competent evidence on that question.

I contend that the laborers of this country are for the gold standard, and that wherever they have an opportunity to express their views at the ballot box they vote for it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Their interest to preserve and perpetuate that standard is greater by far than that of all other interests combined. Cheap money, 50-cent dollars, would not only rob them of their accumulations of the past but of the legitimate fruits of their toil in the future as wage-earners.

I desire to say to gentlemen who are wasting their sympathy upon the toilers of the East, and especially to those who in the last Congress exhibited what to me seemed a suppressed joy when there were labor troubles in some localities in that section, that the toilers of New England, unlike those in the South, have the physical, mental, and financial capacity to assert and maintain their rights against any and all with whom they may differ. The toilers own New England, control New England, and legislate for it in their respective States, and the New England Representatives upon this floor are chosen and sent here by them.

Every member from New England on this floor is here by virtue of ballots dropped into the box from fingers hardened and calloused by toil. In New England they have a right to vote, and their votes are counted as cast. [Applause on the Republican side.]

How is it in the South? I wish to place in the RECORD indisputable evidence of the conditions that exist in the two sections of our country for the benefit of the toilers therein. In doing this I will make reference to the first three districts in Massachusetts, and compare and contrast them with certain districts in the South. The population of the First, Second, and Third districts of Massachusetts is 575,732. At the last Congressional election in the First district there were cast for member of Congress 24,820 votes, in the Second district 22,088 votes, in the Third district 22,179 votes. The total vote cast in the three districts was 65,087, and the member elected in each district stands for a dollar worth 100 cents. [Applause.]

I will take, for comparison, the First, Second, and Third districts of Mississippi. Population of the First district, 143,315; votes cast for member of Congress, 2,469. Second district, population 170,512; votes cast for member of Congress, 3,174. Third district, population 184,297; votes cast for member of Congress, 2,441. Total population of the three districts named, 497,124; total votes cast, 8,084, against 65,087 in the three districts in Massachusetts. Nearly as many votes were cast for member of Congress in the three Massachusetts districts named as were declared cast in the seven districts of South Carolina, five districts in Mississippi, three districts in Georgia, and three districts in Louisiana.

In the three New England districts 65,087 votes were cast for member of Congress. In the eighteen Southern districts just referred to only 66,650 votes were declared, and the population of some of the districts in the South is larger by many thousands than that of either of the districts in Massachusetts.

The following are the Southern districts referred to, with the total vote declared cast in each for member of Congress:

SOUTH CAROLINA, POPULATION 1,151,049.
First district	4,539
Second district	4,175
Third district	4,911
Fourth district	4,632
Fifth district	4,230
Sixth district	1,910
Seventh district	4,938
Total vote declared in the seven districts	28,831
MISSISSIPPI.
First district	4,469
Second district	3,174
Third district	2,441
Fourth district	4,632
Seventh district	3,942
Total vote declared in the five districts	16,321
The vote declared in the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth districts of Louisiana was:
Fourth district	6,032
Fifth district	4,326
Sixth district	2,494
Total vote in the three districts	12,854

The vote declared in the Fourth, Fifth, and Tenth districts of Georgia was:

Fourth district.....	3,247
Fifth district.....	3,091
Tenth district.....	2,290

Total vote in the three districts..... 8,628

The vote in the State of Arkansas makes an interesting exhibit in this respect. It evidences the extent to which the laborers of that State rush to the polls to support those who are to represent them upon this floor for free trade and cheap money.

The First district has a population of 220,261. The present member received 4,103 votes, and was elected, as the Congressional Directory has it, "without opposition." The ratio of votes to the population in that district is 1 to 53.

The Second district has a population of 206,187. The sitting member received 3,415 votes, and was elected "without opposition." Ratio of votes to population, 1 to 63.

The Third district has a population of 190,803. The sitting member received 3,866 votes, and was elected "without opposition." Ratio of votes to population, 1 to 49.

The Fourth district has a population of 147,806. The sitting member received 3,665 votes, and was elected "without opposition." Ratio of votes to population, 1 to 40.

The Sixth district has a population of 160,181. The sitting member received 3,500 votes, and was elected "without opposition." Ratio of votes to population, 1 to 45. That must have been a red-hot campaign. With a population of 925,240, only 18,549 votes were declared cast. [Laughter.] If all the laborers of Arkansas participated in that election, how few their numbers must be in proportion to the total population. There must be great opportunities in that State for a man who is willing to work and does not care to vote. What an Eden for the mugwump. [Laughter.] Where there are so few laborers, all industries must be either infant or post-mortem.

The 7 members from South Carolina, 4 from Mississippi, 3 from Louisiana, and 5 from Arkansas represent a population of 3,963,720. In the 22 districts from which they come there were declared cast for members of Congress 85,153 votes.

The 2 members from New Hampshire represent a population of 376,530. In the districts from which they come on the day they were elected 80,735 votes were cast for members of Congress, only 4,418 less than were declared cast for the 22 members who represent a population of 3,963,720. The laborers vote in New Hampshire. We have neither tramps, dudes, nor mugwumps. [Applause on the Republican side.] In the face of the facts I have recited does anyone believe that the laboring masses have any voice whatever in the selection of the Representatives to this House from the districts in the South which I have mentioned? Do they have any more to do with selecting officials to represent them than the mules that are their daily companions in toil? I fear that their financial condition is but little better than that of the mules.

The price of labor is not regulated by selling it on the auction block, as it formerly was, but from the exhibit in the figures I have quoted I fear they are not permitted to have a voice in the Government under which they live and that they are as impotent politically to-day as when they were slaves.

No people were ever prosperous who deprived the toiler of education and political rights. Those sections of the South to which I have referred have never been visited by prosperity. They are strangers to it and will remain so as long as the toiling masses of those sections are treated as beasts of burden and deprived of their political rights. As I have said, the laborers in New England own New England, control it politically, and legislate as their wisdom dictates in those States. [Applause.]

You charge us with favoritism to the bondholder. Who made the issue of bonds necessary? Patriotism and wise legislation combined made them valuable. We propose that the patriot who is a pensioner and he who contributed funds to equip and support the soldier when in the field shall each receive dollars of equal value—the best known to man. You assume that the bondholder is the great creditor class, and that all who own bonds are wealthy. You err in both cases. The laborers of our land have greater interests as creditors than all other classes combined, both by reason of their accumulated possessions and as perpetual wage-earners. [Applause on the Republican side.] They have $2,000,000,000 due them to-day on deposit in savings banks, nearly as much more in building and loan associations, nearly a billion in mutual-benefit associations, and hundreds upon hundreds of millions in life insurance.

The pensioners have an annuity of nearly one hundred and fifty millions due them annually. The wage-earners will receive more dollars this year for their labor than our entire bonded debt. Your proposition is by the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 to reduce the purchasing power of the dollar to 50 cents, to scale down the value of savings-bank deposits one-half, the widow's insurance and the soldier's pension to 50 cents on the dollar.

Why this divided opinion and contention? I think the answer will generally be found in this, that a community which adopts your policy has nothing to its credit, and that the converse is true, with a community which possesses accumulations respects the rights and cares for the interest of the laboring people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I will refer to the condition of the people of my own State, who are toilers, who stand for sound money and protective tariff, and compare their condition with that of the people of other States where the free-trade and free-silver, cheap-money sentiment obtains, and where only a comparative few express their wish and evidence their political conviction at the polls. Political parties in New Hampshire had been uncomfortably near an even division for a third of a century, until Bryanism, a libel upon the Democratic party, which had stood for sound money and territorial expansion during its entire history, got possession of the organization of that party at its last national convention. At the election following, McKinley's majority was greater than the vote cast for Bryan.

No single Democrat who had been influential in his party in that State supported Bryan. Pigmies and Populists rattled around in places made vacant by intellectual and political giants. [Laughter.] The old leaders were patriots rather than partisans. National honor and individual integrity were dearer to them than political success to be purchased by sacrificing both.

Posterity will give to that host of men who for principle refused to be led by party nomination the most conspicuous pages in our civil political history, and no pen can ascribe to them praise that was not justly earned by their action.

In 1894 the laboring people of New Hampshire had deposited to their credit in savings banks $73,000,000. The people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Virginia, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, and Nebraska, eleven States of the sunny South and one of the fertile West, twelve in all, with a population of more than 16,500,000, had in 1894 about $9,000,000 deposited in savings banks to their credit. New Hampshire, with less than 400,000 population, had more than eight times as much as the 16,500,000 raw materialists and Free Silverites in the twelve States named.

The people of Goffstown, a country town in my district with a population of less than 2,000, had $621,000 to their credit in savings banks in 1894. The people of Virginia, 1,600,000 population; Florida, with 400,000; Alabama, with 1,500,000; Texas, with 2,500,000; Missouri, with 2,679,000; Mississippi, with 1,280,000, and Arkansas, with 1,128,000, a total population of 11,087,000, had to their credit in savings banks $587,000. The 2,000 protectionists in Goffstown, N. H., had to their credit in savings banks $43,000 more than the 11,087,000 free traders and raw materialists in the seven States named.

Texas, with a population of 2,500,000, had $301,648 in savings banks. Merrimac, a country town in my district, with a population of 948, had $387,708 in savings banks, $6,060 more than the 2,500,000 people in Texas had. Yet the raw materialists from Texas are endeavoring to teach my constituents in Merrimac how to find prosperity. [Laughter.]

Georgia, with a population of 1,837,353, had in savings banks $749,596. Somersworth, a town in my district, with 6,027 population, had $918,309 in savings banks, $176,713 more than all the people of Georgia. The Georgian resolves himself into a master of finance and lectures my constituents in Somersworth on how they might adopt his methods and become wealthy.

Tennessee, with a population of 1,767,518, had $1,112,491 in savings banks. Rochester, a town in my district, with a population of 7,386, had $1,421,370 in savings banks, $308,879 more than all the people of Tennessee. In the face of these figures the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is greatly disturbed over the condition of my constituents and solicits them to become raw materialists, and thereby adopt his system of political economy, which was borrowed from the aboriginal Cherokee Indians.

Louisiana, with a population of 1,118,587, had $2,057,845 in savings banks. Portsmouth, in my district, with a population of 9,811, had $2,921,053 in savings banks, $863,208 more than the entire people of Louisiana, and the pig-headed people of Portsmouth refuse to accept the advice of the statesman from Louisiana and march back to the condition which existed in old pod-anger times, the best ever known in Louisiana or that ever will exist under a free-trade policy.

Alabama, with a population of 1,513,000, had, in 1894, $102,347 in savings banks. I had to look some time to find a town in my district whose people were so poor that they had not more than that in savings banks. After considerable searching I found a little agricultural town, Madbury by name, having a population of 364 men, women, and children, who had in the savings banks only $157,770. That was the best I could do; and the 364 people in that little town have $55,423 more in savings banks than the 1,513,000 population of Alabama.

There is an opportunity and field for the raw materialist to do missionary work. Free traders will find in Madbury a people who can exhibit something more than wind to prove the result of a protective tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Florida, with a population of 400,000, had in savings banks $205,710. Against Florida's population of 400,000 of free traders, as represented in the House, I put the little town of Rye, in my district, with a population of 976 men, women, and children, who are sound-money protectionists and who have to their credit in savings banks $419,233, a sum more than twice as large as that of the 400,000 people of Florida.

I next turn to the State of Virginia, and I had no town or place in my district so small and poor that it had not more money to the credit of its people in savings banks than the 1,655,980 people of Virginia, ruled by free traders, Free Silverites, and raw materialists. I then added 1,289,600 Free Silverites and free traders of Mississippi, then took the 1,128,000 in Arkansas, making a population of 4,073,580 Free Silverites and free traders. Then I looked at Harts Location, the place having the smallest population of any in my district, only 187, and I found that the 187 people in Harts Location, under the shadow of Mount Washington, had $677.20 more to their credit than the 4,458,580 people in the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Arkansas had in savings banks.

At sunset on that November day in 1896 when the toilers of the land repudiated Bryanism and called McKinley to the Presidential chair, the citizens of New Hampshire, less than 400,000 in number, had to their credit in savings banks four times as many dollars as all the people of all the States that voted for Bryan. And in the city in which I live, that has a population of 60,000, there was on deposit to the credit of laboring men, women, and children more money in savings banks than stood to the credit of all the people of all the States that voted for Bryan.

I have listened to the very able and eloquent speeches of our friends from the South in favor of free trade and free silver, but they have failed to satisfy me that their constituents, and especially the laborers, favor free trade or free silver; and until a vote in that direction at a ratio of more than 1 to 40 or 60 of the population of their districts is in evidence, I shall refuse to believe that they correctly represent a majority of the voters in districts from which they come.

I can not conceive how any wage-earner could ever desire to be paid in 50-cent dollars, unless in despair the hope of ever obtaining a 100-cent dollar had withered and died.

A comparison of the condition of wage-earners in sections where free trade and free silver are contended for the most strenuously with those in other sections who favor a protective tariff and dollars worth each 100 cents, has only strengthened my original conclusion, that a protective tariff and the gold standard have made this nation what it is to-day, the most powerful, wealthy, and prosperous of the nations of earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Mr. BINGHAM addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WEYMOUTH. Mr. Chairman, the district which I have the honor to represent is devoted very largely to manufacturing and business industries of various kinds. As a business man, representing a business district, I am specially interested in this bill. I do not propose at this time to enter into a lengthy argument or go into the details, but simply desire to express my ideas in a general way on its most important feature, viz, "to define and fix the standard of value" and "to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States," commonly known as the gold standard.

While I shall confine my remarks to this feature, I will say now that I am particularly interested in section 5, which relates to the coinage of silver bullion into subsidiary coin instead of silver dollars, in accordance with the present law.

I shall support the bill because I believe that in so doing I represent the nearly unanimous wish of the people of my district and the State of Massachusetts, and because such a vote represents also the desires of the great business community of this country. The State of Massachusetts has always supported, without faltering, the cause of sound money.

She alone among the Eastern States refused to take advantage of the suspension of specie payments during the civil war and paid the interest upon her bonds in gold coin instead of depreciated paper. I speak with deliberation in declaring that the nearly unanimous wish of the people of my district and State is that gold shall be declared by law to be the standard of value. [Applause on the Republican side.] Both the great parties of the State asserted emphatically for the gold standard in the spring of 1896, when delegates were chosen to the respective national conventions.

The Republican State convention held on March 27, 1896, declared that every promise of the United States "must be rigidly kept, and every obligation redeemable in coin must be paid in gold." The Democratic State convention held on April 21, 1896, declared for the maintenance of the "the existing gold standard of value." When the latter declaration was reversed at a later date it was at the expense of driving from the Democratic party nearly half of those who had voted with it four years before. I may say, therefore, without fear of serious contradiction, that three-fourths of the people of Massachusetts will applaud and approve the passage of this bill, and that the Republican party will gain strength by its courageous and intelligent action which is here proposed.

I have said that it was the almost unanimous wish of the business community of this country that the gold standard should be enacted into positive law. It is not, however, a question of class interest or individual benefits which is involved. The fixing of the standard beyond the reach of reasonable or probable assault is for the advantage of every citizen, except perhaps the few who speculate on the fluctuations of the value of money. To the careful business man facing the severity of modern competition, fixity in the money in which he is paid, as well as in the value of the money he has to pay, are among the principal conditions of doing business.

The time has passed when large profits can be realized in any business except a few which deal with patented monopolies. The closer competition becomes, the more necessary it is that every element in the cost of production should be studied and reduced to its lowest limits. If the standard is uncertain, the rental of money will be high, capital will be driven by fear to withhold itself from new enterprises, and the cost of the raw materials of industry will be increased to cover the fluctuations in the currency and the risk of loss. The American business man meeting foreign producers under such conditions would be handicapped from the start. He would either be driven from the field or compelled to pay lower wages than his competitors. Thus labor will be the ultimate sufferer by any uncertainty regarding the standard of value.

Nothing can be so injurious to legitimate business interests, and labor as well, as a fluctuating standard, nothing so beneficial as a standard which places both upon the bed rock of certainty.

If competition is becoming more severe, it is of the greatest importance that the business interests of the United States should be freed from everything which places them at a disadvantage in seeking the markets of the world.

The time has gone by within which we can rely wholly upon the home market. When we face the producers of other countries we can look for no favors from our own laws except such as enable us to produce under the most economical conditions at home. One of these conditions is a money standard which shall permit the business man to base his calculations upon a certainty instead of making allowances for the possible changes in the value of the money in which contracts are settled.

While this bill is not intended to fully meet all the requirements of a perfect currency system, it is, in my opinion, the first step, and a courageous one, toward putting our system upon a sound foundation. I believe that it will soon be necessary for us to consider what amendments can be made in the banking laws to further perfect them. This is not, perhaps, the occasion to discuss all the plans that have been before the Committee on Banking and Currency. Many of these plans will undoubtedly be laid before Congress later on, and I believe the Republican party will face this problem with the same courage and wisdom with which it has faced the question of the standard. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Massachusetts had a system of banking even before the civil war whose benefits commanded the admiration of the country. The Suffolk system, as it was called, had the approval of the most competent students of finance, and may afford a model in some of its parts for the future amendment of our currency laws. We can not permit such a severe stringency in the money market through which we have just passed, or are now passing, to occur again, if this is due to defects in our currency system which are capable of remedy. High discount rates are almost as severe as instability in the standard.

The remedy of the one evil will naturally follow the remedy of the other. The Republican party of my State declared in its last State convention that—

We look with confidence to the Fifty-sixth Congress for the enactment of measures to so perfect our monetary system that there shall be ample money for the expanding business of the country, and to so arm and guard the Treasury that it can at all times protect the national credit.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that our duty lies plain before us, and realizing this, that although this bill may not be perfect in all its parts, I believe it is such a long step in the right direction that I shall vote for it, if necessary, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

In my opinion there has not been a more important measure before this House during the last quarter of a century, and when it shall have become a law, as I believe it will, with some possible amendments, it will prove a most beneficial one to every American citizen, irrespective of their station in life, and a great blessing to the country at large, and the pledge made by the Republican party to the American people at the St. Louis convention will have been fulfilled. [Applause.]

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman, I think I can say all I desire to say in about ten minutes. I would not attempt to say anything were it not for the fact that I feel it a duty incumbent upon me to rise here in my place and give voice to the sentiment of the people in the State of Wisconsin. I speak advisedly, sir, when I say "the people," because there is but little difference in the sentiment of those people within the borders of that State on the question of finance. When the ten Representatives on this floor shall have cast their votes in the affirmative on Monday next they will have but loyally represented their constituents, whose commissions they bear.

Mr. Chairman, in the State of Wisconsin we have not been overburdened with populist wisdom, nor have we been often overwhelmed by Democratic majorities. Therefore we have been compelled to figure out as best we might this great financial problem. But I thank heaven that we have had in our employ for the three years prior to 1897 one of the most efficient teachers that ever was employed by man, and that teacher has left an impress upon the minds of our people that will not be eradicated by all the sophistry that you may bring or financial philosophy that you may produce.

Wisconsin is emphatically for the gold standard. I represent an original Democratic district—one that was made so by a Democratic legislature—but I say here in my place now that he who ever runs upon a platform proclaiming for the free and unlimited coinage of silver in that district will be buried so deep beneath a mountain of ballots that it will take a hundred men a hundred days with picks and shovels to dig him out. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to this House that I support this bill for the following reasons: First, in 1896, when the State of Wisconsin held its convention to elect delegates to attend that great national Republican convention held at St. Louis in 1896, we declared for Mr. William McKinley and the gold standard, and we were the first State in this Union that did do it. Sir, there has been no change of sentiment in that State up to this moment. Its delegates thus elected did support those two propositions, and in the election following in November the State of Wisconsin gave to those two propositions 104,000 majority.

On Monday next, so far as this House has power to do so, we will settle this financial question by proclaiming for the gold standard. The other proposition we will attend to in the next convention, by indorsing this Administration and its policy by a greater majority than we gave in 1896.

My second reason for supporting this bill is, that among the honest people in Wisconsin we have a great number of citizens of German extraction—and if there is a people on earth that are honest, a people who desire to pay their debts, and do pay them without evasion or repudiation in the best money on earth, it is the German citizens of this country—and in deference to their wishes, as well as all others in my State, I shall vote for this bill.

My next reason is this, that the State of Wisconsin never prospered as it is prospering to-day under the beneficent policy of this Republican Administration. Every wheel is turning, every mine is working, every mill is going, our agriculture and our dairy interests are flourishing, and our people ask no change. They are content with present conditions, and they ask only one thing at the hands of their representatives at this juncture, and that is that they place the question of the gold standard beyond the caprice and whims of political parties by enacting a statute so plain for the gold standard that he who runs may read.

There is still another reason why this bill should receive the approval of all fair-minded men, and that is the removal of all doubts arising from political or other considerations as to the stability of our money. So far as lies in our power we should make it known to all our citizens that the dollar invested to-day, this year, or next will be returned to them without being clipped of one jot or tittle of the value it possessed when invested.

Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], whose sentiments in part I indorse. When he said that this was the grandest and greatest country on earth, I am with him. It is. And the grandest people and the most prosperous people, the most intelligent people; and I have no apologies to make to my countrymen because I uphold this gold standard that we may pay our just obligations in the best money under the light of the sun.

Oh, yes; and he spoke, too, of the terrible times in the last year of the Harrison Administration, in 1892-93. I want to say to the gentleman there never had been in this country such a measure of prosperity as there was in 1892 up to the election in November, and then the light went out, and it stayed out. [Laughter.] Sir, the industries of this country were paralyzed, the wheels of industry ceased to revolve, commerce languished, revenues failed, and perhaps he may be right in saying that under these conditions bonds would have to be issued, as they were issued by the Cleveland Administration, to keep this country out of debt and to maintain the credit of our country.

Grover Cleveland did a splendid work for this nation when he stood as a mighty barrier to a horde of people who clamored for free-silver coinage at a ratio of 16 to 1. Yes, he served his country loyally, and when he went out of power he carried with him the respect of honest Republicans and the censure of dishonest Democrats because of his wise financial policy. He did another and even a greater thing for his countrymen; he divided and scattered the Democratic party to the uttermost parts of the earth, and they have never been able to pull themselves together since. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, he would be put down as a man of more than ordinary self-confidence who could expect at this time to add anything new or instructive to the discussion of the general subject-matter to which this bill relates. I have no hope or expectation of being able to do this myself.

It is my view, however, Mr. Chairman, that in matters upon which great public interests depend and general public feeling is aroused, under the theory of the equality of rights and duties of members on behalf of their constituents in this body, the people of the country have a right to know, and it is the duty of Representatives to enable them to know, not only what are their actions here, but, at times at least, what are the reasons upon which they base their actions.

It is with this view, Mr. Chairman, that, in justice to myself and in deference in particular to the people of my district and State, who occupy a somewhat unique position upon this subject-matter, I desire to submit some very brief observations upon the questions involved in the pending measure.

In voting for this bill, as I shall, I have a right to feel that I shall be acting in accordance with the platform declarations of both political parties in my State.

In 1896, when the agitation upon the currency question along the present lines of thought and division may be said in a certain sense to have begun, the platform of the Republican party of the State of Maryland declared its unequivocal belief in the maintenance of the gold standard, subject only to the limitation of an international agreement for free coinage, which it, however, did not in any sense recommend.

The Democratic State convention, in its platform, which I have before me now, declared just as specifically in favor of what it was pleased to term "the existing gold standard," subject also and only to a similar international agreement, to which it said "the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed."

The Republican party has continued in our State to declare for the gold standard, omitting reference in later years to the matter of international agreement, and the Democratic party has at least made no conflicting declaration to that contained in its platform to which I have just alluded.

The purpose of this bill is to provide for the enactment into law of what has been the settled policy of the Government for more than a quarter of a century.

Assault upon that policy at times within the recent past has been productive of infinite harm to the business interests of the country.

It is now proposed by this bill to effectually protect the policy and the country from danger of such assault by writing upon the statute book a mandate for the preservation of the gold standard and for the payment of all the obligations of the Government in the best money known to the civilized world.

It declares for the maintenance of the parity of all our moneys, and provides the powers and the means and the machinery by which that maintenance can at all times and under all conditions be safeguarded and secured.

It provides against a recurrence of the consequences of what is known as the "endless chain," which will be long and vividly remembered as the parent of panics and kindred conditions that pressed with crushing effect upon the business interests of the country in 1893 and the immediately ensuing years.

It prevents encroachment upon the gold reserve in the Treasury, and forbids the touching of that reserve for other purposes than that of its declared legitimate function of exchange for and redemption of our other moneys.

It severs the connection of the redemption fund with the other ordinary fiscal functions of the Treasury, and makes adequate provision for the preservation and the repletion of this fund under all conditions, and this by direct and mandatory requirements of law instead of the indirect and inferential statements in reference to it found among the provisions now upon the statute book.

A bill that does all these things, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, in the memory of the sad experiences of a recent past, in the flood of the light and the learning that, amidst the hardships of these experiences, has been poured out upon the country, ought to be sufficient to receive the commendation of the whole American people. This bill does all this, and more.

Of course, in the provisions for the operation of these agencies

some discretion is lodged, and must be lodged, in the Secretary of the Treasury as to the manner and the methods and machinery of their exercise. There can be no law framed with safety in the present condition of our currency system, crude and imperfect as it is through the unwisdom of compromises with principle in deference to a so-called silver sentiment, without a lodgment of discretion in these matters with somebody.

For instance, in line 9 and the following lines on page 4, section 4, of the bill, it said that—

If at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary, in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined, etc.

I had thought myself that it would be better to have the words "may at his discretion" left out. Read in the light, however, of the preceding unequivocal requirement and mandate, to redeem and maintain parity, it is but reasonable to assume that the word "may" can fairly be construed as "shall," and that the discretion committed to the Secretary is, as it ought to be, to exercise his judgment as to the fact and the time of the arising of the necessity for the exercise of the power thus given him for the maintenance of the parity as directed.

There is a provision also in the bill under which, as subordinate and ancillary to the purpose "to maintain the gold reserve," it is understood that greenbacks may be transferred to the ordinary fiscal departments of the Treasury, and, it is assumed, thereafter may be paid out in meeting the ordinary expenditures of the Government, if found to be so necessary in the discretion of the Secretary.

This is found on page 3, section 4, of the bill, beginning at line 12, wherein it is said that "for this purpose," meaning for the purpose just before recited, "to maintain the gold reserve," "he may, from time to time, transfer to such fund any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or" (conversely), "he may exchange any of the funds in the division of issue and redemption for other funds which may be in the general fund of the Treasury." The assumption is, of course, that if this is done, an equivalent fund, and a more suitable and more utilizable fund, is placed into the redemption fund "in exchange" for the greenbacks, thus, and in pursuance of the purposes indicated, sent over to the general fiscal side of the Treasury, to be used, it may be assumed, if the Secretary sees fit, in the discharge of the ordinary obligations of the Government.

Under the act of 1878 the greenbacks, when redeemed, were compelled to be reissued.

Under this bill the compulsion to reissue them in any event is removed. The necessity to issue them is, in my judgment, removed. The permission to reissue them will, in my judgment, in the near future be removed, and removed absolutely except only in exchange for gold coin, which is the general requirement of this bill, departed from only in the exceptional case and under the circumstances in which, in the discretion given to the Secretary, they are permitted to be thus "exchanged" for, and for the more effective procurement of, funds to build up and keep up the redemption fund.

The sum and substance of these provisions, committing discretion to the Secretary as to the mode and manner and time of necessity for the exercise of these agencies referred to, tend to show that after all there is just one contingency in which there may be danger to the stability and permanence of the policy which we are now upbuilding, and that is, of course, through the instrumentality of a Secretary of the Treasury, who may be so hostile as to disregard plainly prescribed duty in the administration of the law and the spirit of the law which we are now seeking to enact for the guidance of the financial branch of the Government.

It is in the power of the people always, however, to see to it that no such Secretary shall be placed in charge of that Department.

Gentlemen talk about contraction as one of the consequences of this bill, and seek to find it in the provision for the redemption of greenbacks and other paper money, and their retention in the Treasury unless reissued again for gold, which is the general requirement of the bill as to this form of our currency.

There is no contraction in the bill arising from such cause or any other cause. For every dollar that goes into the Treasury for this purpose as good a dollar, or a better dollar, comes out and goes into circulation. Placing the currency of the country upon a safe, sound, and certain basis does not bring contraction. It rather brings confidence and security, the very essentials of activity of capital, and it is the activity of capital in circulation in the varied and myriad arteries of trade and commerce that brings business and brings investment and enterprise that build up and make prosperity in the land.

The alternative proposition to the policy embodied in this bill, in so far as the line of argument presented by the opposition indicates any affirmative proposition at all, is the old, familiar doctrine of the so-called double standard, or the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, "without the aid or consent of any other nation on the face of the earth."

The American people have heard of that doctrine before. They have seen and felt the blight and bane of its threatened influence in other days.

It would seem to me that the mere suggestion of the return of this policy ought to be a conceded absurdity in this day and under the bettered conditions which obtain in this country at this time.

In strictness and propriety of thought there is no such thing as a double standard. The idea, when analytically considered, is incapable of comprehension; the expression is a solecism in the language of finance. There can not rationally be more than one standard of values, one basis for the adjustment and measurement and comparison of other values, as there certainly can not be more than one unit of value.

There can be the use of two metals, the one secured by, measured by, and interchangeable with the basic and the standard metal, as under the present law and the state of the law as contemplated after the passage of this bill.

There can be, on the other hand, that which is advocated by the Populistic elements of our population as free coinage, under which, by an arbitrary ratio fixed by law, it is attempted to make two metals of unequal value circulate upon a parity and equality of purchasing power; but it has never been and never can be a success in practice.

The cheaper metal, under the operation of an unvarying monetary law, always drives the better metal from the field.

There has never been for any appreciable period of time a circulation side by side of both of these metals upon a parity at any ratio the law could fix upon, even when the commercial values of the two metals at such ratio were approximately equal and when corresponding ratios obtained by law in nearly every country in Europe; and it seems to me to be almost the insanity of delusion to suppose that the United States now, acting alone, could restore free coinage when the market value of gold is much more than 100 per cent greater than silver at the ratio proposed and free coinage is suspended in all the civilized countries of the world.

This placing of the currency system of the country upon a gold basis is needed for all elements of business and business people, but most of all for that great majority of the people of the country made up of the laboring class and of the men of moderate means.

It is not vouchsafed to these to give attention to the intricacies and subtleties of finance; but in times of great fluctuations of values and attendant want of confidence and insecurity in investment and enterprise, due to uncertain and unstable financial systems, it is that class of people that always suffers the first and the last and the longest and the most.

It is found to be in accord with the lessons of experience and of history that the articles of ordinary necessity in life in such periods are the first to go up and the last to come down. It is for the simple reason that they must be had and can not be dispensed with, and that those who depend upon them, to the extent that they can get them at all must pay for them at just such prices as those who control them and profit in them shall prescribe.

The laborer can not hoard his labor and wait for a falling market for goods, because in that waiting come hunger and want. He can not corner his labor and wait for a rising market for it, because in that waiting also come hunger and want to him and those dependent upon him for sustenance and support.

The capitalist can protect himself against appreciable loss, though he may not enter upon new fields for gain; he can hoard his money; he can cease investment; he can, in manifold ways not vouchsafed to the ranks of toil, guard against and weaken the blow of what seems to him to be hurtful financial tendencies.

The provisions of the bill relating to banking have for their object the encouragement of circulation and the expansion of the currency, in response to the growing demands of business and the commercial and industrial development of the country.

It is their purpose to furnish more thorough and better facilities for the establishment of banks in small towns in the rural sections of the country, where there is most need of greater freedom and greater volume and activity of a safe and healthy circulating medium.

It has been said that the bill in this particular does not provide for elasticity of currency. It does not do all in that line, in my judgment, that might be done, but it does much that will contribute to this end.

It removes the tax upon circulation, which is a distinct aid and incentive to the quantum of circulation. It places the tax upon the franchise of the banks as measured by their property and profits. The chief business of the wealthier banks is in their deposits. The chief business of the smaller banks is in their circulation; and this is also the chief instrumentality of their benefit to the people in the localities where they exist. It permits the issue of their notes by the banks to the par value of the bonds upon which they are predicated and by which they are secured, giving a capacity for a 10 per cent enlargement of the amount they are now allowed to issue. The placing of the tax upon the franchise removes what now operates as a hindrance to the circulation of their own notes by the city banks, and equalizes and fairly apportions the burdens in the way of taxation among the smaller and the wealthier banks.

Elasticity in its nature is a composite quality of action, embracing both the power to contract and the power to expand.

Through the operation of the agencies enumerated, it is apparent that the bill does give the power to expand. I opine that that is the principal function to be desired. The power to contract can well be intrusted to take care of itself. Money does not go out and stay out in circulation where there is no need for it and where there are not remunerative returns for it. It is to be hoped that under the beneficent agencies of business development that are at least aided and encouraged by this bill, and this portion of it, and under the splendid and all-prevailing prosperity that at this day prevails in the country, expansion will be the observable manifestation of the volume of currency in use, and that no one need go worrying himself about the drawing in or the contracting phase of what is called elasticity of money.

It has been said that these banking provisions have a tendency to create trusts.

I do not think that this charge can with fairness be laid to the operations of this bill.

That does not create trusts which multiplies and distributes the opportunities for business, whether it be the banking business or any other line of enterprise. It is the very agency which breaks up and prevents the formation of trusts, in that it provides an obstacle to the concentration of money in the chief money centers in the large cities of the country, which has heretofore operated with such detriment to the smaller towns and the agricultural interests and communities.

It has been said, by way of criticism of this bill, that it was a caucus measure.

So was the act for the resumption of specie payments, that great work in which there was much more difficulty to be met and overcome—in the period between the years of 1875 and 1879—than any which now confronts or threatens us in the accomplishment of the objects of this bill in these days, not of panic, but of plenty, not of paralysis, but of prosperity, in which we set about here to supplement and make fast the fruits of resumption in this measure, which, in my judgment, will stand out in the future, alongside of the resumption act, as one of the great landmarks in the financial history of this nation since the war.

There can be no steps backward now in this matter of financial reform. The Republican party has given the people the promise of that which is contained in this bill. It is well for it and the country, whether as the result of caucus action or otherwise, that it stands to-day as a unit, for the first time for a number of years with a majority in both Houses in favor of the principles upon which it is based, in placing upon the statute book this measure, in itself a substantive and substantial work of great good and the framework of yet further structures in the line of financial up-building that the future holds in store for this country if the policies that now guide it shall be permitted to continue and hold sway.

The State of Maryland, I want to say in conclusion, in my judgment, is almost a unit in favor of the principle and the essential features of this bill, and I hope, sir, that without regard to politics, in obedience to the higher interest of the people, which rests above party, the Representatives of that State will stand as a unit for this bill, and thus reflect here the best sentiment of the people of a State in which I do not hesitate to say that in proportion to her population, in the enjoyment now and in alignment with the agencies of the splendid progress of this land, under the leadership of our great commercial metropolis of Baltimore, there is more of independence in politics and more of earnest, honest sound-money sentiment than in any other State in this country.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to vote for this bill. In coming to this determination I think it is due that I should state briefly the reasons which have actuated me. One of my colleagues on this side of the House has wondered at a man being called a "gold Democrat." I assure him there are a great many "gold Democrats" in the part of the country I come from, and the number is increasing. Coming as I do from the great city of New York, I am fully alive to the necessity of having a stable currency, fixed by law. The present bill, while not perfect, does serve the great purpose of enacting into law the recognized fact that the gold dollar is already our standard of value.

The interests of the country require that all our people—the employer and employee, the creditor and the debtor—should know beyond peradventure the meaning of the word "dollar" in their contracts. I believe the best way to accomplish this is to pass a law making gold the legal standard of value. In voting for this measure I do not wish to be understood as indorsing all its features, but I do feel that it is an improvement upon the present conditions.

The power of the President and his financial advisers to change at will from a gold dollar to a silver dollar intrinsically worth only about one-half as much is sufficient reason, even if no other existed, for the enactment of this law. Without wishing to question the patriotism or sagacity of President McKinley, I do submit that this power should not be left in the hands of any one man. In less than a year our two great parties must go before the country in a Presidential contest.

It is due the people that this matter should be so far settled that conservative men may be enabled to carry on their business without fear of a radical change in their currency, followed, as it certainly would be, by unnecessary disturbances and panics.

I believe the removal of the question of our money standard from politics, for some years, at least, will enable the people to pass upon the other and real issues fairly and squarely, and will, I believe, much improve the chances of success of the Democratic party.

The tyrannical rule which now obtains in this House prevents amendment of the bill. It is therefore necessary to vote on it as a whole. I trust that such amendments as may be made in the Senate or in conference will be in the nature of improvement. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, a measure of such great importance and far-reaching in its effects as the one now before this House should have been referred to a committee and discussed section by section before them, then reported and ample time given for every member on the floor, after consultation with his constituents, if he desired, to express his and their views.

This would have been in accordance with the genius of our institutions and in conformity to the usages that prevailed in the earlier days of this Republic. But the dominant party here has chosen to present this banker's bill and so limit discussion that a majority of the members on both sides can only obtain five or ten minutes to present their views. We take it that they feared discussion in their own ranks, for we know they were unable to agree to any bill in the Fifty-fifth Congress. Mr. Walker, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, admitted on this floor that not one of his colleagues in the committee agreed with him.

What does this haste indicate? If the conditions are as favorable as Republican speeches declare, and prosperity is here to stay, as argued every hour by the Republicans on this floor, what can be the necessity for so drastic a measure? Why hurry it through under caucus rule with whip and spur? Do the New York bankers feel uneasy at their low reserves? Are they anticipating another application to the Treasury for the interest not yet matured, or are they fully conscious of the fact that with the revival of business in many lines of trade and commerce there is not sufficient amount of money in this community to do its business? Are they not calculating that with the opportunities afforded under the provisions of this bill, to retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes and redeem the silver dollars in gold, that they will reap a harvest by issuing their own notes to the par value of their bonds, letting them fill the vacuum created by the impounded greenbacks and the retired silver certificates?

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that we can only enter our protest and register our vote against this whole scheme of banking that was foisted on this country during the civil war and has been the fruitful source of loss and suffering to many sections of this country and retarded the growth and development of the Southern States. I shall speak my honest convictions on this question, not with a view to enlightening any member on this floor or changing a single vote here, but for the purpose of voicing the views of a large majority of the voters of my district and entering an earnest protest against such hasty and vicious and destructive legislation.

Through the operations of this bill the bankers propose to obtain absolute control of the currency system of the United States. It is the fight of 1836 over again minus a Jackson to stand for the rights of the people. We will soon realize the truth of Jefferson's declaration to John Taylor in 1816:

I sincerely believe with you that banking establishments are more dangerous than standing armies.

The old United States Bank was destroyed by Jackson's attack, and Benton said in the Senate:

The tigress has been driven from her lair, but she has not been killed; she will come forth again surrounded by all her whelps.

We see her to-day, and her whelps number nearly 4,000. They are bold, earnest, and well organized.

I could easily fill whole pages with their wise utterances, forecasting the future and drawing on their vivid imaginations as they discern unutterable woes and sweeping disasters should we be strong and wise enough to rehabilitate silver, while predicting only good and improving conditions from the issuance by the banks of twice as much token money as free coinage could possibly bestow.

The president of the New York State Bankers' Association said, in April, 1895:

The politician, high or low, who to-day turns from the straight course of sound money and the gold standard stabs dead, once for all, his every chance for political success.

The charter of the old United States Bank was a small matter compared with this stupendous scheme. Our whole currency system is to be under the control of the banks. We are to be turned over, body and soul, to the tender mercies of a system that has been the fruitful source of trouble from the very foundation of this Government.

The letters of Jefferson are full and explicit. Writing to President Adams, in 1814, he said:

I have ever opposed money of banks; not of those discounting for cash, but of those foisting their own paper in circulation and thus banishing our cash. My zeal against those institutions was so warm and open at the establishment of the Bank of the United States that I was derided as a fanatic by the tribe of bank mongers who were seeking to filch from the public, thus swindling on barren gains. But the errors of that day can not be recalled. The evils they have engendered are now upon us, and how are we to get out of them? Shall we build an altar to the old paper money of the Revolution, which ruined individuals but saved the Republic, and burn on that all the bank charters, present and future, and their notes with them? For these are to ruin both Republic and individuals.

He further said:

This institution [national bank] is one of the most deadly hostility existing against the principles and form of our Constitution. Ought we, then, to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our Constitution to bring this powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities. The first measure would be to reduce them to an equal footing with other banks as to the favors of the Government.

President Jackson, in his message of December 2, 1834, used this language:

Events have satisfied my mind, and I think the minds of the American people, that the mischiefs and dangers which flow from a national bank far overbalance all its advantages. The bold effort the present bank has made to control the Government, the distress it has wantonly produced, the violence of which it has been the occasion in one of our cities, famed for its observance of law and order, are but premonitions of the fate which awaits the American people should they be deluded into a perpetuation of this institution or the establishment of another like it. It is fervently hoped that thus admonished those who have heretofore favored the establishment of a substitute for the present bank will be induced to abandon it, as it is evidently better to incur any inconvenience that may be reasonably expected than to concentrate the whole money power of the Republic in any form whatsoever or under any restrictions.

Every student of American history knows that this banking question has been a source of inconvenience and mischief to the people from the days of Alexander Hamilton, our first Secretary of the Treasury, to the present time, and every patriot who contemplates the proposed workings of the bill under discussion knows that it is a very Pandora box of evils and prays for the time to come, as it will one day, when the outraged and wronged citizens of this Republic will rise in their might, and through the regular channel of legislation right the great wrong. Hamilton had little faith in democratic institutions. In the debates of the constitutional convention he said:

I believe the British Government forms the best model the world has ever produced. All communities divide themselves into the few and the many. The first are the rich and the well born, the other the mass of the people.

Hamilton was the originator of the first Bank of the United States, chartered with a capital of $10,000,000.

When the original States framed the Constitution they turned over to the Federal Government the power of issuing money. The States were then prohibited from coining money or making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

Congress was empowered to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and surely the right to issue certificates of indebtedness was implied in the compact. Although a proposition to vest the Government with power to issue "bills of credit" was defeated, it was at the same time expressly declared that in case of war or any other great national requirements the Government could issue acknowledgments of value received, redeemable in taxes. This is the constitutional basis of our Treasury note as explained by John C. Calhoun, advocated by Jefferson and Jackson, and urged by John Tyler, of Virginia, in his third message to Congress.

The second section of the bill, Mr. Chairman, when enacted into law will be a disgrace and a crime, inasmuch as it alters the contract and adds another burden to the long list of outrages perpetrated by the Republican party upon a patient and long-suffering people. To change a contract has always been regarded as a crime.

The nations of antiquity legislated against this. Savages even have been known to cry out against tampering with a pledge or promise. They restrain their animal instincts after tasting salt with their enemies. When an individual alters a note and writes in it more or less than the promise to pay it is called a forgery, and the offender is sent to prison. On this point I make no apology for quoting from one of the foremost writers of our country, who can not be accused of partisanship or self-interest. John Clark Ridpath says on the subject:

The contract is sacred and must be fulfilled, else there is an end of the social compact. What, therefore, shall we say of the fraudulent and covert alteration of all the contracts by changing the units in which such contracts are to be filled, substituting by national authority a new unit or counter, worth more than three times the unit or counter agreed upon and promised? Such a process is, as Lincoln declared it to be, a heinous crime against the people, a sin against mankind. For a long time the subtle work of extending and transforming the bond and at the same time of raising the value of the dollar of payment was so easily and noiselessly effected that the people did not awake to the realization of the thing done until it was done. The class in whose interest the various changes have been made have been able to coddle some, to hoodwink others, to corrupt many, and to terrorize a multitude. We have seen those who have been aroused to the pitch of denouncing and exposing the giant fraud of the century turn about and decry as repudiators, enemies of the national credit, and disturbers of interests of the nation the true friends of public honesty and good faith among men. At least two Secretaries of the Treasury have exhibited to mankind that species of tergiversation which in the administration of high office can hardly be distinguished from treason to the human race.

It is well known that the bonded debt of this country was purchased in time of war with the depreciated greenback. It is well understood that the first issue of sixty millions was receivable for "duties on imports," and was constituted lawful money and legal tender. These notes were as good as coin during the whole war, and at one time were at a premium in gold. This was the kind of money advocated by Jefferson and Jackson and Calhoun and Tyler—to supplement gold and silver. The bankers of Boston and New York and Philadelphia, seeing that their craft was in danger, besieged Congress, as their antitypes through the gold-bug Atlantic City bill are now doing, and secured the exception clauses that you see on the greenback.

These notes, not receivable for import duties and payment of interest on the public debt, were soon depreciated. The demand for coin had been created. Starting at par with coin in January, 1863, it took a dollar and thirty-seven cents to buy a dollar before the end of the year. Before the end of the war it took $285 to pay for $100 in metal. Thus the bonds were sold as low as $35 on the hundred, to be paid at their full face with high interest. The next move was to pass the credit-strengthening act, by which the interest on the bonds was payable in coin. Then came the interpretation of coin to mean gold and the action of Secretaries Foster and Carlisle, so often referred to and so well understood. The former was the first to interpret coin to mean gold and opened the door and invited these bondholders to come in and claim gold. Then Mr. Carlisle, notwithstanding his utterances in 1878, followed the example of Mr. Foster.

It is clearly within the right of the United States to pay these bonds, now amounting to $1,047,365,130, in coin of the standard value of the United States on July 14, 1870. This is the money of the contract, and no harm is done the creditor. There can be no greater injustice done a debtor than to extract from him a dearer dollar than the one denominated in the bond. Now, this is what the bill under consideration proposes to do, and this is what it will do as soon as enacted into law. Not only so, but under this law every private debt is to be discharged in gold.

Every branch of business and every form of obligation is to conform to this law. Every individual man who has purchased anything with deferred payment will stagger along under the ever-growing burden of his debt until, crushed to the earth, he will, bewildered and dazed, wonder whence came the blow that felled him. We witnessed this after 1873; we saw it in all its horror after 1893.

The English farmers and producers had a like experience in 1816; and if you will glance at the pages of her financial history, you will see a picture of distress and suffering such as you are now preparing for large numbers of your own citizens. If the blow could fall on the heads of the authors and perpetrators and supporters of this crime instead of the innocent victims of their selfishness and greed, we might look on with indifference and pity.

That the great law of compensation will follow no man can doubt. In time—it may be long or short—these covenant breakers and iconoclasts will destroy this temple of liberty and find themselves buried beneath its ruins. [Applause.]

THE GREENBACK TO BE RETIRED.

Under this act the Treasury note is to be paid in gold and not reissued save for gold. Thus $346,000,000 of legal-tender money, except for duties on imports and interest, is to be wiped out of existence.

How much better for our whole country it would be were these greenbacks called in and the exception clauses stricken out and then reissued as legal-tender money.

Let us look at this question in the light of law, experience, and common sense. The Federal Government is denied the right under the Constitution to emit bills of credit, and the States are prohibited from doing the same. What right has either to authorize a corporation to exercise a power they are prohibited from exercising themselves? Jefferson opposed Hamilton's bank; so did Madison. It was declared "unconstitutional and anti-American."

But there has never been coin enough in this country to represent the transfers of property; hence the necessity for supplementing with paper money. Who shall issue it? All governments have exercised this sovereign power and do so to-day. Why should the United States delegate this authority to private corporations who will not be able to control the volume and will be tempted by natural selfishness to contract or expand the issues as their interests would be subserved?

An intelligent banker in Virginia asked me several months ago how, in my opinion, this whole contention would end. I replied that no man could tell, but I hoped it would end in the issuance of all paper money by the Government and all banking being done—like other business—on private account. He said:

This seems probable now.

He felt, as so many do, that the bankers will be tempted to abuse the authority given under this act. While in moral qualities fully equal to our best citizens, they are not exempt from the selfishness that attaches to human nature.

We know that many of these gentlemen are patriotic and given to charity and good works and that some of them are even opposed to this bill, seeing that it will bear heavily upon the farmers of the country, who are prohibited from borrowing on their landed estates. To these we say, "You are not included in the list of economical and political sinners who have aided and abetted in framing and passing this bankers' bill." We say to you, as said a gentleman sitting by a young lady in church who appeared deeply moved by the minister's words:

Fair maid, you need not take the hint,
Nor idle texts pursue;
'Twas only sinners that he meant,
Not angels, such as you.

[Laughter.]

With this bill about to become a law the prospect is in the future, certainly, but with the changing attitude of the Republican party on all these questions, who can tell? Several years ago they were for the coinage of both metals. We might easily quote from many of the leading men in proof of this, and he whose name "leads all the rest" said in this House June 24, 1890:

I am for the largest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it. I would give it equal credit and honor with gold. I would make no discrimination. I would use both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

He also voted for the original Bland Act and for the Bland-Allison Act. In the President's letter of acceptance, speaking of the Republican party, he says:

It has inaugurated no new policy. It will keep in circulation, and as good as gold, all the silver and paper money now included in the currency of the country.

In striking contrast with this language and in keeping with the changing attitude of his party on this question, we find in his message sent to us a few days ago the following:

In this connection I repeat my former recommendation that a portion of the gold holdings shall be placed in a trust fund from which greenbacks shall be redeemed upon presentation, but when once redeemed shall not thereafter be paid out except for gold.

The Republican platform of 1896 declared for international bimetalism. Indeed, it is safe to assume that it could not have carried the election had that declaration been left out. The history of the commission sent to Europe in the interest of bimetalism and the celebrated banquet in New York City, where the President committed his Administration unequivocally to the gold standard, is familiar to everyone.

The speeches, few and cautious, made on the Republican side during the Fifty-fifth Congress touching the gold standard are in striking contrast with those being made here every day on this subject. It is an interesting study to watch the course of our opponents upon this question and see how they have glided from one position to another until they have planted their feet, without disguise, upon this Atlantic City bill. Nothing more aptly describes their shifting attitude than the oft-quoted lines of Alexander Pope:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

[Applause.]

Do our opponents expect to quiet this agitation of the money question and put in the background the imperishable principles of the Chicago platform by enacting into law this selfish and ill-advised measure?

They need not lay any such flattering unction to their souls. The fight between the banks and the people will continue even after the gold standard has been firmly established.

The campaign of 1900 will be waged with earnestness born in a conviction of the right and stimulated by an enthusiasm not surpassed by 1896.

The question of paper money issued by Government instead of banks will be emphasized as it has never been before.

The power to issue money is a sovereign power and can not be delegated to banks. The States are incompetent to declare what is money or to regulate its value.

The power to determine what shall be lawful money and a legal tender is, in its nature and of necessity, a governmental power. It is in all countries exercised by the Government. (Supreme Court in Hepburn vs. Griswold, 8 Wall., 615.)

The various legal-tender decisions of the Supreme Court are along this line. Until the Republican party shall secure a court that will reverse these decisions, they have no legal warrant for retiring our Treasury notes and substituting bank paper.

We are familiar with all the bankers say about the issuance of money by the Government. They call this fiat money, while their notes issued on Government bonds is genuine money. What stands behind the bonds? The credit of the Government and power to tax. What behind the Treasury notes? The same power. Is the creature stronger than the creator? Why should the wealth producers of the country be taxed to pay the interest and principal on these constantly appreciating obligations of the Government? This bill will cause a rise in the bonds and impose further burdens upon the people.

The increased demand for gold in this and other countries will produce falling prices and fasten industrial slavery here as it has done elsewhere. But our opponents say the gold output increases. This is their only hope. In 1896 they contended that we had sufficient money—that confidence, aided by tariff duties, would bring prosperity. Now they admit that prosperity has come through increased volume of currency, and have said in their speeches on this floor that nearly $400,000,000 have been added to the circulating medium. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that present prosperity in certain lines and some sections is positive proof of the correctness of our contention in 1896.

The expenditure of large sums of money during a state of war has always created a demand for materials of every kind and brought prosperity to the successful side.

I need not consume time in discussing a question so plain, nor will I now dwell upon the other side of this question—the dire evils of returning hastily to a specie basis after any long protracted war. The conditions in England after 1816 and this country for the past quarter of a century show the ruinous policy of such a course.

Where is the gold to come from that will be needed to carry out the provisions of this bill? When the Secretary of the Treasury exercises this unusual and unprecedented authority to sell gold bonds—as he will be forced to do—he will find himself in the hands of the gold syndicates of the world and in sharp competition with every nation in Europe.

We understand that the gold in the Klondike is fast being exhausted, that no large deposits have been recently found in Alaska. We know that the South Africa mines are cut off by a reckless and destructive war and England will soon be raising her rates of interest and calling on America, presenting her loans, to be settled in gold.

When we bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the legal-tender money of this country, amounting to a billion of dollars, is to be redeemed in gold, and bank notes—not a legal tender—are to take the place, and thus every interest in this country is to be subservient to and at the mercy of the heartless and soulless corporations, we feel that this dominant party here is about to add another to the long list of political crimes with which they have stained the pages of our history.

Knowing that harm will surely come to plague the inventor, we feel satisfied that an outraged and indignant public sentiment will hurl this party from power and return here the friends of the people and the supporters of human rights. No man, unless his soul is warped by the love of a dollar, or his conscience quieted by his direct interests in stocks and bonds, or his party spirit stronger than his love of country and humanity, can approve of and desire such a measure as this.

It is not only in direct violation of our Constitution and opposed to the spirit of our Bill of Rights, not only condemned by men like Jefferson, Jackson, Calhoun, and Tyler, but it is framed in great part and advocated by those who are to be the chief beneficiaries under its operations. The people are denied the right to pass upon its merits, and the party with whose votes it will become a law were sent here instructed for international bimetalism. When you return to your betrayed and wronged constituents you will fall under their condemnation. Many a member across the aisle will sign his political death warrant when he votes for this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The producers in this country are the men who will suffer most from the operations of this bill. Forty-six per cent of these are farmers, while nearly everything they buy has enhanced in price, owing to the conditions we have referred to. Nearly every article they sell is lower now than when Mr. McKinley was elected. Wheat is 20 cents lower; cotton is one-half cent lower than in 1896. So with many other products. This English financial system, Mr. Chairman, may, in case commotions and wars in Europe do not drain away our gold, give prosperity to certain classes of our population—the stockjobbers, the bankers, and some lines of trade and manufactures—but the laborers, the artisans, the farmers, some 75 per cent of our people, will suffer the same privations and hardships that like conditions have produced in England and Ireland. This conflict is world-wide, and strong advocates of the right are in England and Germany as well as the United States.

The money power rules the kingdoms of the world. Its fetters bind the land of the Pharaohs. The blood of slaughtered Armenians cry from the ground against it. Ireland suffers and pleads and struggles in its grasp. India lies prostrate at its feet. And this "land of the free and home of the brave" sees it to-day, encouraging trusts and combines, fostering great railroad monopolies, surrendering to alien owners the right to public domain, setting aside the plain mandates of our written Constitution, ignoring a law of Congress plain to the ordinary mind, and ending in one monster monopoly—the placing of the lifeblood of the nation in the hands of a chosen few. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the scope which discussion of this bill has taken on this side of the House renders its further general discussion unnecessary.

It has brought forth on this side of the House some of the ablest, most comprehensive, and most exhaustive speeches ever delivered in this Chamber. A keynote has been struck which will echo and reecho with, in my opinion, constantly increasing force among the people of moderate means until the great battle of ballots in November of next year.

In the campaign of 1898 in the State of Illinois, on the issue of the free coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, the Democrats doubled their representation in this Chamber, increasing from 4 to 8, and I desire to state that that increase was not made at the sacrifice of principle or by trimming or hedging.

In the event of the passage of the bill now under consideration I predict that the number sitting on this side of the House from the great agricultural and corn-growing State of Illinois will be materially increased.

I am pleased to note that our Republican friends, whether from conviction or the pressure of party caucus I will not now discuss, have unequivocally committed themselves to the single gold standard of money. We, at least of the central part of the Union, propose, from now until the election in November next, to keep this fact before the agriculturists and debtor class.

The participation of our Republican friends in this debate has eliminated from the campaign of 1900 the fast-and-loose policy of that party in 1896. You have forced this bill, this early in the session, before Congress for consideration, and we propose to hold you to every word spoken in debate in support of this bill.

We can not mistake our Republican friends, and would not if we could, as to their position on this bill.

There was an attempt on the part of the Republicans in the campaign of 1896 to make it appear that the Democratic party was opposed to and the enemy of men of means, and opposed to banks and capital.

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that I voice the sentiments of this side of the House when I say that we as Democrats are not opposed to banks, either national, State, or private, or to capitalized corporations possessed of fully paid-up capital and operated for legitimate purposes, so long as those banks confine themselves to receiving money on deposit, and loaning it at not more than legal interest, subject to strict inspection and supervision.

We as Democrats, however, Mr. Chairman, are opposed to the issue of money, either paper or metal, by banks, either national, State, or private, and believe that to be a function belonging solely to the Federal Government and that the Government should not relinquish that attribute of sovereignty to any individual or corporation.

The national banks, as institutions or corporations, have the power under this bill of issuing circulation up to the par value of the bonds they hold.

You will note, however, that no bank is compelled to have more than one-fourth of its capital in bonds, while those of over $150,000 capital, even though their capital be one, two, three, five, or ten millions, are only compelled to take out circulation on $50,000 of bonds. This section permits national banks, to a large extent, to control the volume of circulation, and especially does it permit the utmost latitude of circulation on the part of banks having capitals running into the millions, thus allowing the large banks, in the interests of speculation, to either take out fifty thousand dollars of circulation or increase their circulation to the full amount of their capital.

I do not believe there is a person on this floor who believes that the larger banks of the East will have the welfare of the farmers of the West at heart in deciding the amount of circulation they will take out. If members on this floor from the West can not now see that this is class legislation of the worst sort, I believe that they will be made to see that it is by the voters next November.

To that extent and to that extent only are we opposed to banks.

Keep them in proper bounds, and we will view them as favorably as any other legitimate commercial enterprise.

The legislation sought to be enacted by this bill in regard to national banks is, in my opinion, strictly class, and therefore un-American and dangerous. I view with extreme jealousy and distrust any legislation clothing any corporation with governmental functions.

The strictly class features of this bill are made still more evident by analyzing a part of its second section.

The only object of this bill, as set forth specifically, in terms in its title, is "To define and fix the standard of value, and to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States."

That is done by its first section. That this bill is in the interests of the holders of Government interest-bearing obligations as well as of the national banks is observable from the slightest inspection of its second section.

The effect of making, as does this section, United States interest-bearing bonds on their face payable in coin, payable in gold, is most certainly in the interest of the holders of such obligations.

If that step was necessary to bring those obligations to par or keep them at par, then such facts might be urged as reasons for such legislation. But, Mr. Chairman, those obligations, payable by their terms in coin, now command a premium, and that reason can not, therefore, be urged.

The committee in the report accompanying this bill does not attempt to show that such an enactment is necessary to the establishment or maintenance of the single gold standard. In the absence of such attempted proof, and with all United States interest-bearing obligations commanding a premium, the inevitable and only conclusion is that it is for the sole benefit of the holders of such obligations, and not to maintain the parity of all forms of money.

I submit that the framers of this bill should show to this House how changing the relations between debtor and creditor in regard to obligations antedating this bill serves to maintain the parity of all forms of money.

We on this side of the Chamber stand for and are in favor of sound money. We stand for gold and we stand for silver and we favor the free coinage of both as Constitution money, and we favor such an issue of money on the part of this Government in addition to the coinage of both gold and silver—and without the intervention of the national banks—as will bring the per capita circulation of this nation up to its business requirements.

This bill, as a piece of class legislation, stands, Mr. Chairman, without a peer, and as a monument to corporate greed without a rival. I raise my voice in opposition to it, not because I am not willing the opposition should have the opportunity to commit itself to it and the infamous provisions it contains, but because the district which I represent more than sustains me in my unfaltering opposition to this narrow piece of legislation. It affords me great pleasure to know that I will have an opportunity to record my vote against it. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, so little time has been allotted to me that I will not attempt while upon this floor to make any logical argument upon the merits of the measure now pending before the House; but I desire to reply briefly to some of the reflections made upon the State of Nebraska, which I have the honor in part to represent, and upon the great leader of Democracy, whom we have the honor to claim as our citizen.

A pet theme with some of the newly-fledged orators upon the other side has been to refer in sneering tones to Nebraska. The fact that Nebraska gave 15,000 majority in the last election against the Republican ticket seems to rankle in the breasts of some of the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] stated that he was at one time a resident of our State, and I am at a loss to understand why he now manifests so much of bitterness toward our citizens. What measure of Nebraska's far-famed hospitality was denied to him while he dwelt within the borders of our State—that upon his leaving our soil he should carry within his bosom so much of venom and should wait until he stands upon this floor in order to give it utterance?

He also stated, if I remember his language correctly—

That we started out in the campaign of 1896, after having reduced the people to a condition of poverty and distress, by giving to the country a brand-new soap bubble, filled with Nebraska wind, and that we in Nebraska wanted the American people to chase that bubble off over another financial and industrial precipice.

The gentleman is mistaken as to the facts in the case. The bubble to which he refers as coming from Nebraska was not furnished by the Democratic party and was not a product of our State. The soap out of which the bubble was formed came out of the Republican Congressional campaign fund. The wind came from everywhere. It is true it started from Nebraska, and as that bubble of Republican soap arose the Nebraska breezes lifted it higher and higher. It passed from out the boundaries of our State and was carried to the far Northwest. It touched the earth for the first time at Tacoma, Wash., and from there rebounded, and lifting higher and higher it soared eastward in its course until it landed in the Capitol of the nation, and just exploded in this Hall Wednesday afternoon when the gentleman from Washington rose to speak. [Laughter and applause.]

The endurance of this immense bubble proved that plenty of soap was used in its formation; but to fill that mighty bag of wind was such a drain upon the resources of Nebraska that we have had neither cyclone, blizzard, nor tornado since it lifted its distended sides and sailed from the borders of our State.

The gentleman said that he lived in Nebraska a number of years ago, and in speaking of William J. Bryan he said:

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I know him as well as though I had been through him with a lantern.

Why, the gentleman from Washington is so small, compared with the man whom he assails, that his "going through Mr. Bryan with a lantern," from an intellectual standpoint, could be likened only to a lightning bug wandering through the vast recesses of the mighty Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman further said in his remarks that he had heard Mr. Bryan speak from the rear end of a freight train in 1896; that Mr. Bryan "addressed the crowd, first from one side of the car and then from the other," and I infer that the gentleman from Washington was, on that occasion, in the same situation as the Republican party of to-day is upon the question of finances—on both sides of the track at the same time, trying to get with the biggest crowd.

He refers, however, in sneering tones to the fact that the train from which Mr. Bryan was speaking was a freight train, as if that fact in itself was a disgrace. If Bryan was speaking from a freight train, it was because he was using at the time one of the means of travel provided by the railway companies for the general public in many parts of the West. He was not then and is not now, thank God, the favorite and choice of trusts and railway magnates, and his fare was paid at the rate of 3 cents per mile, and paid by himself. [Applause.]

We have long since learned in Nebraska that all good to the common people does not come from gentlemen who ride in special trains and palace coaches, furnished by campaign contributions from the great trusts and corporations. What matters it whether truth be spoken from the front platform of a palace car or from the rear end of a freight-train caboose? Why, the greatest teacher the world has ever known, He who spoke words of love, of comfort, of hope, and mercy to mankind, entered the gates of Jerusalem surrounded by the common people of that time, riding upon the back of an ass. History is silent as to what became of the ass, but, judging from the voice alone, we might infer that it was a remote ancestor of the gentleman from Washington himself. [Laughter and applause.]

It might be said in this connection, without irreverence, among the first acts of Christ after entering the city was to go within the walls of the temple, which had been erected for the worship of God the Father, and drive the usurers and money changers of that age out of the sacred edifice. In all His journey upon earth the only time He was ever moved to anger, the only time He was ever moved to do an act of violence, was when He stood within the temple and saw the usurers and money changers robbing the poor of God; and it is recorded that the sight of greed and avarice in such a place moved Him to take whips and scourges and drive them from the temple, saying, "This was my Father's house, but ye have made of it a den of thieves."

Sir, the Democratic party in its humble way is trying to follow in the pathway of the Great Teacher. We are trying to purify this temple of liberty which our forefathers erected by driving from power the usurers and money changers of this age, who are seeking to fasten their grasp of avarice and greed upon the reins of this Government, and the Democratic party in this struggle has selected a man to lead them who is in earnest in the fight. Democracy asks of its leader only that he be loyal to the cause of the people; that he be true to the promises of the party made in its platform, and that when placed in power he will free this nation from the dictation and control of the usurers and money changers of this age; and such a man we will welcome to Washington as Chief Executive of this nation, even though his means of travel should be as humble as were the means of travel used by Christ when he entered the gates of ancient Jerusalem.

Bryan spoke from a freight train; well and good. We do not deny this serious charge against our leader; we even admit that it is true, and many of us are even proud of the fact. The people were there in mighty crowds to hear him, and I trust the time will never come in the history of this nation when the Democratic candidate for the office of President will sit in a cottage, vine-clad or otherwise, while special trains, run by money wrung from the coffers of greedy corporations, drag unwilling voters to his door, there to bow before him and pay him homage.

Much more has been said of Nebraska and its policy by gentlemen upon the other side. For what Nebraska has done we make no apology. When in recent years leaders proved false, and men high in the councils of Democracy of this nation betrayed the trust reposed in them and sought to lead the party of Jefferson and Jackson into the camp of organized greed, the Democracy of Nebraska was among the first to raise the banner of true Democracy and reach forth its hand to remove from power the leaders who were false, and in that contest she gave the bravest and best of all her sons to lead the fight.

Arrayed against Democracy in that struggle was every man who would coerce and threaten the vote of labor, every corporation whose greed for gain demands of the Government that the many be taxed for the benefit of the few, every trust which seeks to fatten by controlling the necessities of life, every money changer who demands that this Government should surrender the mighty power of a nation's credit to banking corporations. Out of that struggle Democracy came defeated, but bearing in the grasp of her great leader the unsullied banner of a pure Democracy. At the end of that contest Democracy knew its friends and knew its foes. The alignment was made, and now with ranks unbroken we are waiting to again renew the battle. We have no compromises to offer. We want or seek no barren victory.

To the gentlemen upon the other side we say, "You are in the saddle; we know the powers which sent you here, and we bid you to go on and do the bidding of your masters." Between what you stand for and what Democracy represents there is hopeless and irreconcilable conflict. We stand for the man as against the dollar; we stand for human liberty as against inhuman greed; we stand for the Declaration of Independence, side by side with the American flag wherever it may be planted; we stand for republic as against empire, no matter where the struggle may be waged; we stand against polygamy and slavery, no matter whether practiced in the domains of the Sultan of Sulu, in the far-off islands of the sea, or within the boundaries of the sovereign State of Utah; and, above all and beyond all, we stand for Bryan as against McKinley. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the indorsement of this bill by the Republican party proves that the party as a whole is now worshipping the goddess of greed and gold in the Temple of Mammon. The commercial and manufacturing trusts now robbing our countrymen were created by the last Republican Congress, when it passed the Dingley Tariff Act.

The best definition of a trust is that it is a combination of capitalists formed for controlling the price of any given article. Trusts control prices by the destruction of competition. The Dingley tariff bill crippled or destroyed foreign competition, hence the organizers of trusts have only to combine the home producers of the article forming the basis of their trust into one great corporation and thus secure the control of the price of that article.

Barbed wire and binding twine, two indispensable articles to the farmers and stock raisers of the West, have doubled in price since they have been manufactured by a trust. These two trusts did not exist before the passage of the Dingley tariff bill, and if it was repealed foreign competition would restore the old low prices of these articles. The object of this gold-standard bill is to create the greatest of all trusts—a money trust.

The Republican party by the demonetization of silver destroyed one-half of our primary or redemption money and left gold without any competitor. This destruction of silver competition was forced unawares on this country by moneyed aristocrats who had even then conspired to form a great money trust. The same money kings are the promoters of this gold-standard bill. The first section of this bill violates the Constitution of our country. That great instrument makes both gold and silver coin primary money.

I will now prove my assertion by the greatest men our country has ever produced. Andrew Jackson, in his farewell address, said:

My humble efforts have not been spared during my administration of the Government to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and something, I trust, has been done toward the accomplishment of this most desirable object.

Mr. Webster, the great constitutional lawyer and statesman, in a speech in the Senate on December 21, 1836, said:

I am certainly of opinion, then, that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard or to displace this.

This Congress by this bill establishes the gold standard, and, if Mr. Webster is right, every man who votes for this bill violates the Constitution of our country and their oaths of office.

Allen G. Thurman, the noblest Roman of them all, said in a speech in the Senate:

Has there ever been, so far as we know, a more prosperous country than were the United States from 1789 to 1861? Did any nation ever exceed the progress we made in population, wealth, education, refinement, and the general well-being of the people in those seventy-two years? And yet during all that period we had bimetalism, for we gave no preference to gold over silver or silver over gold.—Congressional Record, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, volume 7, part 1, page 767.

Mr. James G. Blaine sustains Daniel Webster's opinion that gold and silver is the money of the Constitution. He said:

I believe gold and silver to be the money of the Constitution—indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which that great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on Congress to declare that either metal should not be money. Congress has, therefore, in my judgment, no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold; no more power to demonetize either than to demonetize both.—James G. Blaine in the Senate, February 7, 1873; Congressional Record, volume 7, part 1, page 830.

According to the opinions of Mr. Webster and Mr. Blaine, the Republican party is now, at the bidding of its masters, the manipulators of bonds, determined to violate the Constitution and demonetize and retire silver from circulation. But let us examine the Constitution for ourselves. It declares that Congress "shall have the right to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," etc. The term "coin" means both gold and silver. In defining the power of States, section 10 says:

No State shall * * * coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, etc.

It is clear to my mind that the Constitution, by these two sections, makes both gold and silver coin a legal tender in the payment of debts. This bill, in its second section, in effect declares that all obligations, public and private, shall be payable only in gold; it changes all existing public and private contracts for the payment of money and makes them payable in gold only, thus violating the Constitution of our country and legislating untold millions of money out of the pockets of debtors and into the pockets of creditors. This bill, in the second section, declares that all interest-bearing obligations of the United States and all United States notes and Treasury notes under the law of 1890 shall be payable in gold coin.

This will legislate into the pockets of the bondholders of United States bonds hundreds of millions of dollars. Mr. Cleveland, during his last Administration, tried to force Congress to issue gold bonds. Congress wisely refused to do so. New York bankers then offered to take sixty-two millions of our gold bonds at 3 per cent interest rather than the coin bonds they did take at 4½ per cent, thus offering to pay the Government sixteen millions of money more for the sixty-two millions of gold bonds than for the coin bonds.

This bill now puts into the pockets of the men who own these same bonds the $16,000,000, and takes it from the great toiling and producing masses of the country. We must remember that we have more than $800,000,000 of outstanding United States bonds; hence, taking the above estimate, furnished by the bankers themselves, and applying it to our entire bonded debt, we find that the effect of this bill in changing the contract in the bonds from coin to gold will cost our taxpayers about $200,000,000. No wonder, then, that for years these bondholding plunderers of the country have been busy holding conventions at Baltimore, Indianapolis, and other cities, and in magnanimously furnishing Congress this bill for the purpose of fastening the gold standard on the people, and then legislating into their pockets hundreds of millions of unearned dollars. These patriots, who in time of war dodge conscription acts and hire substitutes, and in time of peace dodge taxation, are more than willing that the toiling millions of our citizens should fight the country's battles in war and pay its taxes in times of peace. It is easy to take the widow's son and put him in the Army, but we can not levy an income tax on the rich man's property.

I have had a resolution for the purpose of levying an income tax on the wealth of the country before a Republican committee of this House for three years, and they will not report it to the House. Their bondholding, tax-dodging masters will not permit them to pass my resolution. I have had a bill before the Judiciary Committee of this House for two years, taking away from the Federal courts jurisdiction in all corporation cases, so that State courts could enforce State laws against trusts and corporations without being perpetually enjoined by Federal judges. The Judiciary Committee refuses to act on this bill because trusts, bondholders, and corporations furnish the funds to elect Republicans to office. On the other hand, these plutocrats and their national banking allies have had no trouble whatever in getting this outrageous gold-standard bill before this House for discussion.

Let us analyze this infamous measure. It—

1. Makes the dollar of 25.8 grains of gold the standard unit of value.
2. Declares that all bonds now existing and hereafter to be issued shall be paid in gold.
3. Makes all greenbacks and Treasury notes under the Sherman Act payable in gold.
4. All silver certificates to be restricted to one, two, and five dollar notes; legal-tender quality of silver dollar not affected.
5. Establishes a division of issue and redemption, to which is assigned all records and accounts relating to the issue, redemption, and exchange of the several kinds of United States money.

6. Establishes a permanent gold reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the total of greenbacks and Treasury notes outstanding.

7. Directs the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain this reserve and, if necessary, to sell gold bonds at not exceeding 3 per cent, payable in twenty years, but redeemable in gold, at the option of the United States, after one year.

8. Prohibits any transfer from the Treasury general fund to the division of issue and redemption that will reduce the general fund below $50,000,000.

9. Greenbacks and Treasury notes to be redeemed in gold at the will of the holder and to be paid out again only in exchange for gold.

10. Reserve funds to be used to maintain parity, and to do this the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued.

11. Provides for coinage of subsidiary, worn, or uncurrent coins and repeals the law limiting issue of such coin and fractional currency to $50,000,000.

12. Provides for the issue of United States notes and Treasury notes in denominations not less than $1, as the Secretary prescribes.

13. Increases the issue of national-bank circulation up to the par value of bonds deposited to secure such circulation.

14. Repeals the 1 per cent tax on national-bank circulation and substitutes a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent in the aggregate on the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of banks.

15. Authorizes the incorporation of national banks of $25,000 capital in towns of not to exceed 2,000 inhabitants.

This bill will retire the greenbacks permanently, and eventually impound silver and silver certificates except subsidiary silver coins.

The bill creates a penitentiary in which it imprisons the vast sum of $757,427,973. This bill calls this money penitentiary a division of issue and redemption, and the Secretary of the Treasury can impound the above great sum in that division as long as he desires. This is a dangerous power to put in the hands of one man.

This bill takes the tax off of the circulation of national banks, and on the other hand it increases the issue of their notes up to the par value of the bonds deposited to secure their circulation. Heretofore they could only issue 90 per cent of that amount. In short, this is a bill for the benefit of bankers and bondholders, and it should be so stated in its caption. The bankers of New York brought on a panic during Mr. Cleveland's last Administration for the purpose of securing the repeal of the silver-purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, and for the purpose of retiring the greenbacks, silver coin, and silver certificates. They failed then in their last objects, but they are now carrying out their designs.

A circular issued by them at that time shows the foul conspiracy they then formed and are now carrying out in full. They practically all belong to the American Bankers' Association, and through the executive committee decide as to policies and then act together. The executive committee is said to have mailed to each member of the association the following letter. That a letter of this character was sent out has been admitted by many of the bankers who received it:

DEAR SIR: The interests of national bankers require immediate financial legislation by Congress. Silver, silver certificates, and Treasury notes must be retired, and the national-bank notes, upon a gold basis, made the only money. This will require the authorization of from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 of new bonds as a basis of circulation. You will at once retire one-third of your circulation and call in one-half of your loans. Be careful to make a money stringency felt among your patrons, especially among influential business men. Advocate an extra session of Congress for the repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman law and act with the other banks of your city in securing a petition to Congress for its unconditional repeal, per accompanying form. Use personal influence with Congressmen, and particularly let your wishes be known to your Senators. The future life of national banks as fixed and safe investments depends upon immediate action, as there is an increasing sentiment in favor of Government legal tender and silver coinage.

Comment on the deep cunning and depravity of this circular is unnecessary. Its authenticity and hideousness is clearly shown by Senator David B. Hill in a speech in the United States Senate on August 25, 1893. Senator Hill was then and is now a gold standard Democrat, and his statement in regard to this bankers' circular and their acts should have great weight. He said that—

Some portion of the present panic may be traced to a concerted effort on the part of numerous monometallists to produce it in order further to discredit silver as the standard money of the country. With ghoulish glee they welcome every bank failure, especially in the silver States, little dreaming that such failures would soon occur at their own doors.

They encourage the hoarding of money; they inaugurated the policy of refusing loans to the people even upon the best of security, and attempted in every way to spread disaster broadcast throughout the land. These disturbers—the promoters of public peril—represent largely the creditor class, the men who desire to appreciate the gold dollar in order to subvert their own selfish interests, men who revel in hard times, men who drive harsh bargains with their fellow-men, regardless of financial distress, and men wholly unfamiliar with the true principles of monetary science.

Henry Ward Beecher, the father of Republicanism, in a speech in St. Louis in 1872, said:

Does anybody suppose that there is any legislature on this continent that could not be crushed or bought out by corporations? Compared with this despot even slavery itself were a small danger. When we see the slinky track of the monster, we may justly ask, What are we coming to? There has got to be a sentiment created on this subject, or we will be swept away by a common ruin. I do not believe in communism, but when I see what rich men as classes are doing with our legislatures, what laws they have passed, what regard there is to the great common interest, I fear that the time will come when the workmen will rise up and say that they have no appeal to the courts; no appeal to the legislatures; that they are bought and owned by consolidated capital. And when that time comes, unless it brings reformation it will bring revolution.

Since Beecher uttered this prophecy in 1872 the power of consolidated capital has increased an hundredfold. Twenty years ago John G. Carlisle in a speech on this floor said—

That the obvious trend, at that time, toward the single gold standard was not the mere procession of eyeless events, not the fortuitous progress of cumulative forces beyond human control, but the product of a cool, deliberate conspiracy—that the conspiracy was international; it straddled the ocean and planted one foot in Europe and one in this country.

Mr. Carlisle several years after this, in another speech on this floor, denounced the demonetization of silver as the greatest crime of the century. Now he is bending his knees to the golden calf, "that thrift may follow fawning." The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that at one time or another Sherman, Wade, Morton, Blaine, Logan, Garfield, Ingalls, McKinley, and CHANDLER were fully cognizant of and admitted the conspiracy of consolidated capital, as alleged by Beecher and Carlisle, and each of them in turn have denounced the conspirators in the name of humanity. The Republican party was once led by statesmen; now it is led simply by the agents of the conspiracy of consolidated capital. The policy of the party in presenting and passing this outrageous bill is dictated by King Boodle.

Governor Pingree, a lifelong Republican, says:

To-day all the trusts, all the monopolies, every agency which is bleeding the people has taken refuge under the wing of the Republican party, because they fear the Democratic party, which has kicked them out. Government by bondholders has become quite common in the world; nations have gone into the hands of receivers. When anyone exposes their schemes they wrap themselves in the flag and cry, You are attacking the party. When they elect themselves to office by main force or money, they ascribe it to divine intervention of Providence in behalf of the nation and its honor.

Such hypocrisy and rascality is as apparent as it is appalling.

Senator THURSTON, the chairman of the last Republican Convention, in a recent speech in Baltimore said:

Capital in every form, alarmed at the free-silver agitation, rushed to the support of the Republican party, and it has happened thereby that the financial jugglers and manipulators and great trusts and combines were forced into the Republican party.

If further proof is needed that this bill is dictated by and to be made a law for the purposes of enriching—beyond even the dreams of avarice—the "financial jugglers," as they are called by Senator THURSTON, I will put on the witness stand another Republican Senator—the greatest of them all—James G. Blaine, who said in the Senate on February 7, 1878:

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value, and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property.—Congressional Record, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, volume 7, Part I, page 321.

Mr. Blaine was right, and this bill will retire from circulation four hundred millions of silver dollars and bring about the results pointed out in this speech.

Another Republican Senator very recently warned his party against surrendering to the money power which so effectively contributed to carrying the election of 1896, that made McKinley President. I refer to Senator CHANDLER, who on February 16, 1897, said in a speech in the United States Senate:

In repetition and conclusion, I declare my belief that President McKinley and the other leaders of the party, in its present advent to power may, by wise designs and virtuous deeds, indefinitely prolong its ascendancy in the country. This can surely be done by making it the true party of the people.

If, on the contrary, this is not done, and the Republican party shall content itself with seizing and enjoying the spoils of office, surrendering unreservedly to the money power which so effectively contributed to its recent victory, acquiescing permanently in the existing gold standard, and treating bimetallicism according to the advice of the Portland Oregonian, as a juggling bung, and the promise to support it, according to the New York Sun, as a pledge never intended to be fulfilled, Republicans will find the tide of political battle once more turned against them, and they will soon exchange places with their now sore, bleeding, and prostrate foes.

My countrymen, here is an admission and a prophecy by a great Republican leader. His admission is that the money power effectively contributed to Republican success in 1896. The prophecy is, "If the Republican party contents itself with seizing and enjoying the spoils of office, surrendering unreservedly to the money power, etc., that they will speedily find the tide of political battle once more turned against them." May this prophecy be speedily fulfilled is the prayer that goes up from the robbed and toiling millions of our people. The same Senator, writing in the North American Review in August, 1896, says:

The time of trial of the Republican party will come after its approaching victory. It will then be in order to determine whether it is the slave of the rich capitalists, of the promoters of trusts and monopolies, and of the bloated bondholders, as the Bryan Democrats will contend.

This bill completes the surrender of the Republican party to the money power, and will, according to the prophecy of Senator CHANDLER, turn the tide of political battle next year against his party and cause the election of a Democratic House and President.

The Democratic party has always supported the cause of the masses of the people. It was betrayed by Cleveland, but it promptly and bravely discarded him and repudiated his doctrines, and the last Chicago convention buried Clevelandism and Cleveland forever, so far as the Democratic party is concerned.

The Republican party in urging the passage of this bill is bartering its last vestige of manhood or honor for funds with which to corrupt voters and carry the Presidential election next year. The Dingley tariff bill paid the price of McKinley's first election, and the score of millions of dollars invested by manufacturing plutocrats in that election has already been repaid to them many times over by the American consumers. The Dingley tariff law is the father of the numerous trusts that have been created since its passage.

The pending bill to establish the gold standard will be the prolific mother of trusts. The gold trust is the worst of all trusts. It makes it possible for the national banks to control the volume of money in circulation among the people, and to contract and expand such volume as the interest of bankers may dictate. The bankers are thoroughly organized and can at any time after this bill becomes a law meet together and dictate as they are now dictating the financial policy of this Government. Now the national banks only own the Republican party; pass the bill and they will soon own the American people.

The Republican plutocrats argue that the Government should not enter into the banking business. I reply that the banks should not enter into the governing business. They now govern the Republican party, and that party is governing this Republic; hence the national bankers are running the Government in their own interest only. They have by this, their gold-standard bill, taken the tax off of their circulation. They have given themselves the right to issue 10 per cent more money than they had before. This bill gives them the right to issue and control all of the paper money that will be in circulation. All of the gold will be held as reserve funds. National-bank money will have no competition whatever in the paper-money field. The greenbacks will be impounded in less than twelve months in the Treasury penitentiary, and National Banker Gage will be the keeper of this penitentiary, in which seven hundred and fifty millions of the people's money will be locked up and kept out of circulation. Republican Congressmen always vote for an issue of gold bonds to aid national bankers to grow rich. The bankers in turn furnish the G. O. P. campaign funds.

The bondholding robbers of our country who are demanding the passage of this bill prate constantly about honest money and denounce the advocates of the free coinage of silver as repudiators and as favoring dishonest money. These bondholders by this bill repudiate the contract between themselves and the Government. Their bonds are payable in coin, and they demand gold, which change will put hundreds of millions in their pockets.

They are therefore guilty of extortion as well as repudiation and dishonesty.

The North American, a Philadelphia newspaper, a mouthpiece of plutocracy, commenting on this bill in a recent editorial, praises the Republican party for solidly supporting it and also admits the crime of 1873. I quote its language:

That can mean only one thing—that the Republican policy commands the confidence of a great majority of the people and that its Democratic opponents are in a forlorn hope.

It has been a long and weary task to bring the party and the country to this solid ground. When the silver question first became acute, in 1877, there seemed hardly any gold men, Republicans or Democrats, west of the Alleghenies. New York and Pennsylvania were honeycombed with heresy. Ohio was a hotbed of unsound financial ideas. Mr. McKinley himself voted for the free coinage of silver.

In 1890 the Republican party passed the Sherman silver-purchase law, by which the Government was compelled to buy 15 tons of pig silver every month and issue paper money to pay for it. In 1892 the Republican platform said:

"The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallicism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money," and as late as 1896 the convention that nominated President McKinley pledged the party to promote an international agreement for the free coinage of silver.

In 1873 Congress established the gold standard without knowing what it was doing. Now, after nearly a quarter of a century of discussion, it repeats that action with its eyes open, and the country indorses its action. There is no longer a "crime of '73."

This editorial admission of the duplicity and venality of the Republican party is as amazing as it is true. Republican plutocracy not only dictates legislation, as admitted by this editorial, but also controls the Federal courts. Let me prove this proposition. In 1894 the Democratic party passed an income-tax law, so as to force the wealth of the country to bear its just share of the burdens of Federal taxation. The Republican party did everything in their power to defeat this just law. Plutocracy then appealed to their other allies—the Federal courts—for the purpose of defeating the law. The Supreme Court of the United States, at their bidding, held the Democratic income-tax law unconstitutional, and in doing so surrendered without reserve to organized wealth. But there were four members of that court who refused to stultify themselves in the interest of plutocracy, and in their dissenting opinions sounded notes of warning that should open the eyes of the American people to the dreadful conditions that confront us.

I will quote these opinions.

Harlan, J., of Kentucky, said, in his dissenting opinion:

The practice of a century, in harmony with the decisions of this court, under which uncounted millions have been collected by taxation, ought to be sufficient to close the door against further inquiry.

In my judgment, this decision may well excite the gravest apprehensions. It strikes at the very foundation of national authority.

The decision now made may provoke a contest in this country from which the American people would have been spared if the court had not overturned its former adjudications.

The practical effect of the decision to-day is to give a certain kind of property a position of favoritism and advantage inconsistent with the fundamental principle of our social organization, and to invest them with power and influence that may be perilous to that portion of the American people upon whom rests the larger part of the burdens of the Government, and who ought not to be subjected to the dominion of aggregated wealth any more than the property of the country should be at the mercy of the lawless.

Brown, J., Michigan:

My fear is that in some moment of national peril this decision will rise up to frustrate its will and paralyze its arms. I hope it may not prove the first step toward the submergence of the liberties of the people in a sordid despotism of wealth.

As I can not escape the conviction that the decision of the court in this great case is fraught with unmeasurable danger to the future of the country, and that it approaches the proportions of a national calamity, I feel it a duty to enter my protest against it.

Jackson, J.:

The practical operation of the decision is not only to disregard the great principles of equality in taxation, but the further principle that in the imposition of taxes for the benefit of the Government the burdens thereof should be imposed upon those having most ability to bear them. Considered in all its bearings, this decision is, in my judgment, the most disastrous blow ever struck at the constitutional power of Congress.

White, J., Louisiana:

It takes invested wealth and reads it into the Constitution as a favored and protected class of property which can not be taxed without appointment, while it leaves the occupation of the minister, the doctor, the professor, the lawyer, the inventor, the author, the merchant, the mechanic, and all other forms of industry upon which the prosperity of a people must depend subject to taxation without that condition. A rule which works out this result, which it seems to me stultifies the Constitution by making it an instrument of the most grievous wrong, should not be adopted, especially when in order to do so the decisions of this court, the opinions of the law writers and publicists, tradition, practice, and the settled policy of the Government must be overthrown.

The meanest man that I ever heard of had borrowed his kind neighbor's blind horse to work, and at night he would feed the horse, but would steal the corn from him and give it to his own fat hogs. The Republicans by this bill are stealing corn from the blind horse—the people—and giving it to the fat hogs—the bondholders and bankers. If a man was to change a bond of the United States from $1,000 to $1,250 he would be justly sent to the penitentiary for his crime. His crime would be committed for greed and to gain 25 per cent more money than the bond called for.

This bill changes, for greed and gain, the same bond by striking out the word "coin" and writing the word "gold." According to President Cleveland this change makes the bond 25 per cent more valuable than it was before. These crimes are the same; one is the act of a rascally individual, the other of a depraved political party. That great commandment of the decalogue, "Thou shalt not steal," was plainly violated in both cases, but this commandment seems not to have any place in the Republican code of morals. They have been riding that blind horse—the people—for a third of a century, and all the time stealing corn from him. The question for solution now is, How long will this blind horse submit to such treatment? How long will the American people consent to be robbed by Republican plutocracy?

The patient people must be aroused from their lethargy and drive the Republican party from power next year. Unless the people scourge the agents of the money changers from the halls of Congress and promptly repeal their outrageous legislation, we may find that Mr. Beecher's prophecy will soon be fulfilled. He said that—

When the time comes that the people are bought and owned by consolidated capital, unless it brings reformation, it will bring revolution.

That time, as shown by this bill, has come. Shall the liberation of the people from plutocracy come through the ballot or the sword?

The mighty Roman Republic fell by the sword because Romans betrayed Rome. We are swiftly following in her footsteps. Mr. Walker, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and a lifelong Republican, on the floor of this House, in a speech on March 23, 1892, in speaking of the demonetization of silver, said:

In relation to the effect of this law in the United States from 1873 to 1879, half the wealth of this country not in solid securities changed hands during that period, always in favor of the strong against the weak, and thousands of idle workmen walked our streets. In all our Northeastern States our highways and villages were filled with tramps.

The Republicans have retired Mr. Walker to private life for uttering these obvious truths. The remedy for existing evils lies only in retracing our steps, in remonetizing silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, in taking from national banks the right to issue money and in restoring that right to the Government, in preventing the retirement of the greenbacks, and, in short, by putting in power the Democratic party, so that it may write on the statute books of our country the principles enunciated in its last national platform in Chicago in 1896. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am precluded by the limited time allotted me from analyzing and discussing in detail the provisions of the pending bill. I shall therefore merely enter my solemn protest against the passage of this measure, which I regard as vicious in principle and fraught with direful consequences to the masses of the American people. It is a measure which neither party has ever had the temerity to place before the people as an exposition of its views on the financial question, and is brought to our consideration by the representatives of a party which has heretofore steadfastly proclaimed its allegiance to the double standard.

For the first time the Republican party has openly espoused the cause of the single gold standard, which its ablest spokesmen have heretofore denounced in unmeasured terms as an unmitigated evil. The pledges of the Republican platform of 1896 are to be thrown to the winds; the promises of the Republican orators in the campaign of that year are to be abjured, and an Administration which came into power pledged to bimetalism is to fasten irrevocably upon the American people the yoke of gold.

In the campaign which resulted in the election of Mr. McKinley the people were promised, by his adherents, bimetalism through international agreement. Democrats then pointed to the illusory character of this assurance, which was unsupported by faith, and was meant to—

Keep the word of promise to our ear
And break it to our hope.

The mutations of time have disclosed what Democrats could then only predict. The bimetallic pledge in the Republican platform was a sop to Cerberus. It was a vote-catching device, whose promoters were more to be despised than its victims were to be pitied.

I wish to call attention briefly to the statement of the leading member of the commission appointed by Mr. McKinley on the part of the United States to negotiate the holding of an international monetary conference. After many months spent in Europe he elsewhere made a most interesting statement of the result of the commission's labors. In January, 1898, he said:

When Congress met a year ago, there was universal expression by the Republican membership in the Senate that the pledge of the party in its St. Louis platform to promote international bimetalism by every means in its power was an undertaking to be faithfully carried out without evasion or delay.

He said the commissioners appointed by Mr. McKinley were all bimetallicists, who believed that "continued adhesion to the gold standard means only disaster to our agricultural and commercial interests;" that it "was the earnest desire of the Chief Executive to carry out in its integrity the promises of the platform of the Republican party, pledging it to every effort to bring about an international bimetallic agreement." He recited the hearty co-operation and active aid rendered by France in this movement, and quoted the resolution unanimously adopted in the English House of Commons March 17, 1896, as follows:

That this House is of opinion that the instability of the relative value of gold and silver since the action of the Latin Union in 1873 has proved injurious to the best interests of this country, and urges upon the Government the advisability of doing all in their power to secure by international agreement a stable monetary par of exchange between gold and silver.

He summarized the situation in Europe in these words:

The cause of bimetalism is not dead in Europe. It is a living, vital, and growing force. * * * It is as cowardly to abandon hope as it is false to talk about failure. * * * It is my sincere conviction that an international bimetallic agreement is still feasible.

In the face of these declarations of the President's commissioner we are asked to close our eyes to the realm of hope and to put upon the statute books legislative adherence to the gold standard. Is the world to understand that America abandons the money of its Constitution and will hereafter be deaf to entreaties for an international bimetallic agreement? Have three short years demonstrated the wisdom of a financial policy which neither party then had the courage to advocate? Bimetalism is superior to a single standard of either metal, or else the platforms of both parties in 1896 in this particular were based upon a fallacy.

The object then sought by both parties was the same. The Republican party looked to the attainment of bimetalism by the aid of foreign countries, while the Democratic party demanded its establishment without waiting for the consent of foreign nations. The excellence of a policy per se can not depend upon the means by which it is to be inaugurated, and the superiority of the double standard having been thus affirmed by the indorsement given it by both parties, its abandonment by the Republican party at this stage is either a craven surrender to the money power or a confession of the faithlessness of its own promise.

This bill, if enacted into law, must be taken as the sum total of Republican wisdom on the financial question. The legislative as well as the coordinate executive branch of the Government is in the hands of our political opponents, and upon them must rest the responsibility of its enactment. It comes before this body with the unanimous indorsement of the Republican caucus of the House, as we have been assured by members on the other side. It is doubtless the result of mature study upon the part of Republican leaders, for more than two years elapsed after Mr. McKinley's inauguration ere its consideration was urged.

Meanwhile the fields have yielded abundant harvests; a period of diminished consumption and almost suspended production has logically and necessarily been followed by an era of increased consumption and corresponding prosperity in manufacturing; the God of battles has smiled upon our efforts to relieve an oppressed people in a neighboring isle. Reserving to a later occasion the discussion of a proper policy with respect to the islands which have come within our jurisdiction and sovereignty as a result of that conflict, I can not refrain from expressing my surprise that at a time when commercial America is looking toward enlarged trade relations with Cuba, Puerto Rico, the islands of the Pacific, and even China and Japan, the Republican party should seriously propose a large reduction in the amount of money in circulation.

Is there too much money per capita in this country? This contention can hardly be tenable when the slightest stringency in the money centers brings forth reports of the probable issuance of clearing-house certificates, an extra-legal device, or announcements from the Treasury Department of the anticipation of interest payments on Government bonds in order to place more money in circulation. No; the design must be to make money dearer; to increase the purchasing power of the dollar; to add unearned increment to the hoards of the wealthy, and to compel labor to yield more of the sweat of its brow to secure a dollar.

The squeeze has already begun. The New York stock market may not represent with mathematical exactness the material conditions existing in this country, but as a barometric reading of the money situation it is well-nigh infallible. There prices have already tumbled, and the end seems not yet in sight. England, the greatest creditor nation on earth, needs the yellow metal to prosecute its war against a people struggling for the maintenance of their god-given rights. American securities held in that country are sacrificed to a point where intrinsic value is lost sight of in the mad struggle to secure gold, and the consols of gold-standard England seek purchasers around par.

Banking institutions in New York, whose scheduled assets exceed their liabilities, are already embarrassed and will shortly be compelled to close their doors in the face of heartbroken depositors solely because of their inability to secure funds on collateral ordinarily deemed superabundant; and yet the gold standard, the system of contraction, is held out to us as a financial policy which will insure confidence in commercial circles and prosperity to our material interests.

The pending bill seeks to make a donation of untold millions of dollars to the holders of bonds of the United States in that it provides that all interest-bearing obligations of the Government now existing as well as those hereafter issued shall be payable in gold coin. The bonds which have heretofore been issued were sold with the option in the United States of redeeming in coin—that is, in either metal.

On February 8, 1895, Mr. Cleveland, then President of the United States, in a message to Congress, announced that he had arranged for the sale of 4 per cent bonds, payable in coin thirty years after their date, to the amount of a little less than $62,400,000, which were to be issued for the purchase of gold coin amounting to a sum slightly in excess of $65,000,000.

Such a premium is to be allowed the Government—as to fix the rate of interest upon the amount of gold realized at 3½ per cent per annum. The privilege is especially reserved to the Government—to substitute at par within ten days from this date in lieu of the 4 per cent coin bonds other bonds in terms payable in gold and bearing 3 per cent interest, if the issue of the same should in the meantime be authorized by Congress. * * * In the agreement just concluded the annual saving in interest to the Government if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege reserved would be $399,150, amounting in thirty years, or at the maturity of the coin bonds, to $16,174,770.

Said he—

He goes on to say—

The authority then sought by Mr. Cleveland to issue gold bonds instead of coin bonds was refused. The coin bonds to which he referred were issued, and yielded so much less because they were payable in coin instead of gold, as Mr. Cleveland claimed; hundreds of millions of dollars of other coin bonds have since similarly been issued and sold, and yet, notwithstanding the fact that the purchasers paid less therefor to the Government or the Government pays a greater rate of interest thereon because, as is alleged by Mr. Cleveland, the bonds are payable in coin instead of specifically in gold, the pending bill proposes to declare that all United States bonds shall be payable in gold.

Mr. Chairman, I wish time permitted as careful dissection of the provisions of the pending bill as its importance warrants. I should then in detail point out what I regard as the unsafe and unsound changes in the national-bank act which are now proposed. The issuing of money is one of the prime attributes of sovereignty, and its devolution, even in part, upon private individuals or corporations is in derogation of Government. To increase the amount of notes which a bank may issue upon the United States bonds deposited with the Treasurer, as the pending bill proposes, is merely the aggravation of an existing evil.

By reading between the lines I draw the conclusion that from the shading this measure will ultimately culminate in the greatest of all gigantic trusts, the national-bank trust.

I am unalterably opposed to a single standard of either metal. I believe in the free and equal coinage of both metals in sufficient volume to transact the business of the nation, both internal and external. I believe that the establishment and maintenance of the single gold standard is a wrong, the evil effects of which will be felt in an accelerated ratio as time progresses.

Thus believing, I give my voice and shall cast my vote against the pending bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NEVILLE Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], in the opening of the discussion upon this bill, advanced the proposition that legal-tender quality does not enable money to circulate beyond its intrinsic value without the pledge of the Government for its full redemption.

The standard silver dollar has circulated since 1878 at a greater value than the worth of the metal of which it was composed and without any law or guaranty for its redemption.

Standard silver dollars, by reason of their legal-tender quality, were always worth 100 cents, while the trade dollar, with 7½ more grains of silver to the dollar, but without legal-tender quality, would not circulate for 100 cents.

We assert that it is the legal-tender quality, and not the intrinsic value, that makes money circulate for its face.

The crippled greenback, prior to resumption of specie payment, never circulated for its face value, while the full legal-tender demand note always did.

From the 9th day of February, 1793, to 1837 the British, Portuguese, Spanish, and Spanish dominion gold coins and the Spanish milled silver dollar circulated in this country at their legal-tender value without regard to their intrinsic value, and ceased to circulate altogether when the legal-tender quality was removed; and it was the repeal of that legal-tender law, destroying such coin's use as money, that created the panic of 1857, and such panic was not caused by a too large per capita of money, as the gentlemen upon the other side of this House would have us believe.

It was a remarkable argument put forth by those gentlemen, that the three great panics were the result of too large a per capita of money. Such an absurd statement will be without fruit in my State. Every Populist farmer in Nebraska knows that the panic of 1857 was caused by destroying the legal-tender quality, and thus throwing out of circulation the foreign coins then in common use in this country.

Every Populist laboring man in Nebraska knows that the panic of 1873 was caused by leaving the standard silver dollar out of the revision of the Mint Act, and substituting in its place a non-legal-tender trade dollar. And all classes of people in Nebraska know that the panic of 1893 was caused by the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, the threatened cessation of the coinage of standard silver dollars, and the agitation to that end by the fisherman from Buzzards Bay and his Republican allies.

No panic was created at the beginning of the war by the issuance of Government paper money in large volume, no panic was created by the coinage of silver in 1878, and no panic was created in 1890 by the passage of the Sherman Act. And yet we are confronted with the startling Republican argument that the coinage of standard silver dollars will create the greatest panic the world ever experienced.

The gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, is also frightened about the intrinsic value of money. He does not want 50 cents' worth of silver forced upon the laboring men and farmers for 100 cents' worth of the product of their toil. And yet that gentleman is old enough and has legal knowledge enough to fully understand that the same law which would force the metal in a dollar made of silver upon the laboring man and farmer would enable them to force it upon the merchant, the lawyer, and the doctor, and even upon the banker, for the same value given by them; and he also knows that that would result in making it a 100-cent dollar.

Again, my venerable friend from Ohio desired this side of the House to point to a single thing which we said in 1896 would happen if McKinley was elected that has since come true. And when we did not stand up from our seats, he took our love of comfort to be a confession similar to that enjoyed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], when he thought we were not vigorous enough in our defense of Bryan.

In fact, the gentlemen upon the other side of this House have a habit of trying to prove their cause by an assumption of authority over us, and I have made up my mind that they believe we should move like jumping jacks when they open their mouths. In fact, I presume they think we are Tagals and need Christianizing. They surely do not believe we are wholly heathen; for, if they did, they would offer some of the conciliatory measures used upon the Sultan of Sulu.

For the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio, let me say that in Nebraska we predicted that if the Republicans were successful in electing McKinley before his term of office expired they would throw off the mask which made them appear to be friendly to silver—America's greatest natural resource—and fasten upon this country the gold standard.

While every Republican speaker in Nebraska denied the prediction that we then made would come true, yet it is rapidly approaching a verity.

We predicted that wheat, one of the great staple products of Nebraska, would continue to fall in price, and to-day it is selling for 23 cents less per bushel than it did on the day McKinley was inaugurated.

We predicted that prosperity would not come without an increased supply of standard money. And while the gentlemen upon the other side of this House then claimed that the quantitative theory of money had nothing to do with the question of prosperity or adversity, yet they are now claiming credit for a very largely increased supply of money.

Again, the members of the other side of this House wanted us to stand up and evidence a spot in the country where prosperity is not in full sway. And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], for the purpose of clinching the inference, declared that last summer he could not find idle men enough to put a foundation under his barn; yet in the very next breath he accounted for his dilemma by telling us of a habit of reducing his liabilities by bluffing his creditors.

While I am sure this bill will retire the Republicans from power at no distant day, yet I fear and tremble for the suffering which I know the people must endure after getting into the clutches of the greedy bankers and trusts before they can get out again.

No doubt under the provisions of this bill the national bankers will inflate the currency by loaning to the Government and the people enough money to give us prosperity with a string to it, and in a few years thereafter the Republican leaders will be abroad in the country again explaining how the indebtedness of the people is an evidence of prosperity.

But when pay day comes those who are not as fortunate with their bluffs as the gentleman from Iowa will have learned enough about the cussedness of this bill to clamor for its repeal, and then the leaders of the Republican party will be climbing over each other in their effort to get back to the people.

No one doubts their ability to about face. It is an open confession with them in the discussion of this measure. It is not strange they expect us to stand up when they say "arise." It has become second nature with them to turn when HANNA says "flop."

The money issued by the national bankers under the provisions of this bill will be good enough to get the people in debt, but when the gold holders pull the string attached to prosperity the bankers will close their doors, and this money will not get the people out of debt.

However, a few years later the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, can again come into this House and tell us of $85,000,000 in mortgages canceled, and he might add then, as he could have done a few days ago, the words: "By sheriff's sale at the east door of the court-house."

It is no trouble for the gentlemen controlling the action of the members on the other side to cause a panic when it can be turned to their own profit. Their illustrious ancestor, Nathan Rothschild, sped with great haste across the English Channel, and gave a false report of the result of the battle of Waterloo, in order that his agents, stationed in various parts of the Kingdom for that purpose, might buy at a sacrifice the property of the fleeing, panic-stricken people.

Slavery, crime, and suicide in every country have been the direct result of greed and avarice enforced by someone in power to compel submission.

In conclusion, let me ask the gentlemen upon the other side a few questions:

First. Is it not clear that to insure continued prosperity we must at all times have enough money to transact the business of the country, and that the money must be all legal tender, or that enough of it must be such to impress the people with confidence that the token money and bonds can be redeemed without affecting the business need for circulating medium?

Second. Will our own people retain confidence because the Government can bond us, and, if need be, afterwards execute upon our property to meet the bonds?

Third. If redemption money is necessary to keep up confidence and a parity with token money and to redeem bonds, is it not necessary to keep redemption money at home?

Fourth. If the gold standard is fastened upon the people of this country by this Congress, which will be the next nation that will come to the gold standard?

Fifth. As each nation comes to the gold standard will it not increase the demand for gold and therefore require more property to get it and continue the declining level of prices upon all commodities not controlled by trusts until all nations have adopted the gold standard, and then the level of prices go to the bottom?

Sixth. Will not universal gold standard force universal equilibrium of prices for like products and like labor, varied only by the cost of transportation?

Seventh. Under a universal gold standard if one nation is compelled to have gold to pay indemnity levied by a conqueror or to otherwise relieve her distress, will she not bid enough property and labor to get it? And as it is human nature to buy where we can the cheapest, would not our country be compelled to bid like amounts of property and labor to keep our gold at home?

Eighth. Would not universal gold standard also force universal free trade?

Ninth. Is it not true that our surplus is always in competition with home consumption until the home demand is supplied, and then goes into the markets of the world in competition with the surplus of like products of other nations?

Tenth. Is it not also true that the surplus never hunts a glutted market, and that the tariff would not enhance the value of our own surplus?

Eleventh. Could we prosper very long by selling the products peculiar to our country in competition with the world and buying the products peculiar to other countries at a value enhanced by our own tariff?

Twelfth. Would not bimetallism protect our products and labor?

Thirteenth. Under bimetallism, if a distressed nation was compelled to overbid for one of the metals as it went out would not the other come in in exchange for it and remain with us to keep up confidence and prices, enable us to do business at the old stand, and prevent the disaster of competition in products and labor with a nation forced by distress to bid? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. RAY of New York) having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration House bill No. 1, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 19 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until 12 meridian to-morrow.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4457) for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of certain State military organizations—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BARNEY: A bill (H. R. 4458) to remove the charge of desertion against John W. Boyd—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FARIS: A bill (H. R. 4459) granting an increase of pension to Matthew Comer—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4460) for the relief of the heirs of David B. Sanders, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4461) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Andrew B. Ritter—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4462) to correct the military record of Benjamin Cornwell—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORGAN: A bill (H. R. 4463) to increase the pension of John C. Sharp—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4464) to increase the pension of H. C. Stroman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4465) for the relief of William H. Sprinkle—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MUDD (by request): A bill (H. R. 4467) for the relief of John F. Anderson and Cary C. Barr—to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARMACK: Petition of Mrs. Alexander Daniels, of Gibson County, Tenn., asking reference of her war claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina: Petitions of James M. Parrott, Lon Taylor, H. T. Gergory, and others, of the Third Congressional district of North Carolina.

By Mr. WANGER: Petitions of Rev. B. G. Parker and others, of Jenkintown, H. H. Issett and 63 others, of Yardley, Howard S. Jones and others, of Montgomery County, Women's Literary Club of Conshohocken, and Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pottstown, Pa.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 16, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Rules of the Fifty-sixth Congress be amended as follows:

After section 57 of Rule XI insert as a new paragraph, numbered 58, the clause of the rules relating to the Census Committee, amended by the insertion of the word "Select," to read as follows:

"58. All proposed legislation concerning the Twelfth Census and the apportionment of Representatives: to the Select Committee on the Twelfth Census."

Change the numbers of the last two sections of Rule XI as follows: 58 to 59; 59 to 60.

In section 2 of Rule XIII change the words "clause 57 of Rule XI" to "clause 59 of Rule XI."

In Rule XLII change the words "clause 3 of Rule XXIV" to "clause 2 of Rule XXIV."

Mr. DALZELL. I would state, Mr. Speaker, that these changes are merely formal in their character. They are mainly a change in the number of the section arising out of the introduction of a new rule by this House, and are changes made necessary in order to conform to the action of the House already taken.

The last clause changes the words in clause 3 of Rule XXIV to clause 2 of Rule XXIV, which is made necessary by the action of the House itself. These are the only changes, and I presume that there can be no objection to them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object to the consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing). But I desire to be heard for a moment only. It is evident, of course, that the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is merely a formal one. But it seems that the amendments to which he has called attention are made necessary by the present condition of the rules. And I only arise now for the purpose of suggesting that this necessity emphasizes the position that we have taken, that it was improper and unwise to adopt a code of rules in such manner as these were adopted on the first day of this session. The rules should have been referred to an appropriate committee and should have been considered by them and reported properly to the House and have come before us for consideration in the usual way, as other reports come from committees.

I only desire to say that the course pursued was unwise, as is evidenced by the necessity for these changes, and that we ought to wait in the future until the committees are appointed to consider these matters. That is all I wished to say.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING OF THE DIGEST.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask also unanimous consent for the adoption of the following resolution, which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,000 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Speaker and Clerk of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. This is the ordinary resolution which is considered and adopted at every session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1899, on the 19th day of said month.

RECEPTION OF THE STATUE OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The concurrent resolution will be read.
The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 1.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee consisting of three members from the Senate and five members from the House of Representatives be appointed to make arrangements for the reception and unveiling, on January 18, 1900, of the statue of Daniel Webster presented to the United States by Mr. Stilson Hutchins and erected on Massachusetts avenue, in the city of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] asked me before the introduction of the resolution if I desired to make any objection. I assured him that I did not. But I wish to inquire if there had been any previous agreement on the part of the Government to accept this statue of Mr. Webster.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the facts of the case are simply these: The appropriation bill of 1897 for the fiscal year of 1898 contained an appropriation of $4,000 for the construction of the pedestal on which this statue is to rest. I do not know whether there has been any other formal acceptance of the gift than that. I suppose that would commit the Government to the usual acceptance, provided the statue was found worthy as a work of art.

I understand this is in accordance with the usual precedents in such cases. It will lead to no expense. None is contemplated by the resolution, and none would occur in consequence of the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. My only purpose in making that inquiry was simply this, that it can not be assumed by any gentleman who desires to present the Government with a statue that the Government will accept it. It seems to me that there ought to have been something in the prior legislation of Congress indicating a purpose to accept it, even before the work was done. However, it is certainly something to ornament the city, and as it will cost no more than the amount that has already been expended, or authorized to be expended, I have no objection to the acceptance of it; but I do believe it is a bad precedent to allow a private citizen, or anybody, so far as that is concerned, to assume that the Government will accept his gift.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, there may have been a formal acceptance. That would be indicated by the appropriation, but I do not know.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "three" in line 3 and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five," so that the representation of the House may be five instead of three, which, I am informed, is the ordinary precedent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the Senate resolution, substituting five for three as the number of representatives from the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the special order, the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 1. The Clerk will report section 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 23.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I listened with a great deal of interest to a large portion of the speech made yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and pondered in my mind the significance of his statements in regard to the effect that the pending legislation would have upon the interests and welfare of the country. The speech was an able one from the standpoint occupied by him and was significant in the matter of prophetic declarations which lie for their fulfillment away off in the future.

If I were compelled to accept his statements as correct, I should fear for the welfare of my country. I should have liked to ask the gentleman one question at the time, and that would have been whether or not, in his opinion, if the Democratic party had been successful in 1896 and had enacted a provision of law for the coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1—whether or not the tide of gold that has flowed into this country, and which the gentleman admits, and truthfully admits, has in large part helped to stimulate the prosperity of the country, would have come here? I should have liked to have him answer the question whether it is not a fact that in all history the influx of a cheap money into a country drives out of circulation the better currency.

But that was not the point that I desired to call attention to. I remember that the gentleman made a very able speech on the 19th day of March, 1897, upon this floor at the time of the debate upon the Dingley bill, and I have reflected since yesterday that from the circumstance of that speech and the subsequent history of the country great comfort may be drawn by us that his fearful forebodings of yesterday may not come true. I desire, Mr. Chairman, as a part of my speech, that the Clerk shall read two paragraphs which I have marked in that very able speech to which I have referred.

I desire to assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZIELL] that there is no disposition on this side of the House to unduly protract the debate upon this bill. If we could hope ultimately to defeat it, we would feel required by a sense of duty to employ all honorable means to do so; but knowing that we can not prevent its passage, we believe that it will be better for the country and, in the end, it will be better for our party, that it shall pass without unreasonable delay. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If it can produce the good results which its authors prophesy it will, then the people ought to have the benefit of it as speedily as possible, and if it can not produce those results, then the sooner it is tried and found wanting the sooner it will be repealed and the sooner the people will be relieved of its unjust exactions. I warn you now that if this bill fails—as fail it will—to bring the prosperity which the Republicans have promised, you will not live long enough to obtain a patient audience with the American people upon the absurd proposition that you can make them more prosperous by increasing their taxes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I ask that the gentleman from Ohio may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to complete the quotation, because it is better than my average production. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to proceed for five minutes more, is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, you must put your principles to a practical test. If you were right, your task is an easy one; if you were wrong, it is an impossible one. As for my part, I was never more confident of any event in the future than I am that your bill will disappoint its promoters and the people. Our political opinions are all at fault if you can make the people more prosperous by making their taxes higher—if you can make them more contented by privileging incorporated greed to still further prey upon their wasted strength. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can undoubtedly make the favored classes prosperous; but that was not your promise. You promised to make the times better for all the people; and you must redeem that promise or be driven from the high places which you occupy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, in the light of the history of the past two years, I say to my friends here on this side of the House and to my friends on the other side of the House, there is hope for us yet. [Laughter on the Republican side.] May we not apply to our situation the words of the poet:

Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take;
The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and will break
With blessings on our heads.

[Laughter.]

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, Republican jubilation over the result of the recent elections is one of the most amazing phenomena that I have observed in forty-nine years of tabernacled in the flesh. [Laughter.]

It reminds me of a story I once heard. A young physician was called in a case of great delicacy. When he returned to the office, his veteran partner asked him how he got along. "First rate," replied the youthful disciple of Aesculapius. "The mother and baby are both dead, but I saved the old man!" [Great laughter.]

So with the Republicans. [Laughter.] They lost Maryland. Their beastly majority in Ohio was reduced to a minority of fifty-odd thousand. The Fusion majority in Nebraska was multiplied fivefold. The Fusionists made large gains in Kansas. The Republicans of Pennsylvania sustained great losses and were so badly scared that they imported a job lot of heelers and repeaters from this city [laughter], but Republicans howl with delight because they "saved the old man!" [Great laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

With their combs cut, both wings broken, and their tail feathers plucked, they still crow because they "saved the old man!" [Renewed laughter.]

After the celebrated Hampton Roads conference the following dialogue took place between Abraham Lincoln and William H. Seward: "Did you see Alexander H. Stephens?" asked the President. "Yes," replied the Secretary of State. "See him with his overcoat on?" "Yes." "See him with it off?" "Yes." "Did you ever see so small a nubbin in so large a shuck?" "No."

So with this Republican victory on which gentlemen plume themselves. It is a very small nubbin in a very large shuck.

It seems to me that they must feel much the same as did Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, when in walking over a field he had won by the skin of his teeth, gazing upon the piles of corpses of his brave followers, he mournfully exclaimed, "Another such a victory and we are undone!"

CIVIL SERVICE AS PRACTICED BY REPUBLICANS.

So far as I am advised, there is only one Republican in the House thoroughly justified in rejoicing over the November elections. That is my venerable and amiable friend from Ohio, General GROSVENOR; not because Nash is a minority governor, but because the means resorted to to elect Nash at all demonstrate that our beautiful and bewildering system of civil-service reform is now placed in "the process of ultimate extinction" [laughter], an object dear to the heart of the gentleman from Ohio. And it must be peculiarly gratifying to him that its overthrow was accomplished by two Ohio statesmen, President William McKinley and Hon. William F. Burdell, treasurer of the Republican State executive committee. They killed Cock Robin dead as a smelt.

When the President declared in his inaugural that "no backward step must be taken in civil-service reform," all the civil-service reformers in the land and all the beneficiaries of that system pronounced him "another Daniel come to judgment," and General GROSVENOR and other Republican spoilsmen retired into the Cave of Adullam. But the President, growing weary of beholding the mourning countenances of Grosvenorian pot-hunters, had compassion on them and, forgetting his inaugural, took a step—a long step—backward.

Indeed, he had on his seven-league boots and at one step went backward about one-eleventh of the entire distance traveled over and fought over inch by inch by the reformers in many long, weary years, for by Executive order of May 29, 1899, he turned over to the tender mercies of Republican spoilsmen between 8,000 and 10,000 timorous, trembling, tearful, squirming Democratic officials whom civil-service reform had clothed as with a garment. There has not been such a wholesale slaughter of the innocents since the days of King Herod. Thus was the countenance of General GROSVENOR made to shine. He and his coparceners emerged from the Cave of Adullam and fell upon the victims, tearing and rending them, while the reformers toppled into the Slough of Despond.

Another thing happened to warm the cockles of General GROSVENOR's heart when Hon. William F. Burdell, treasurer of the Republican State executive committee of Ohio, issued his famous circular inviting—and his invitation was tantamount to a command—all Federal officials to come down with the dust to assist in the great work of political reform—with a big, big R—then being carried to fruition by Hon. MARCUS A. HANNA, Senator and chairman of the national Republican committee; Hon. CHARLES DICK, Representative in Congress and chairman of the Ohio Republican State committee, and Hon. George B. Cox, the hoodlum chief of Cincinnati, the maker and unmaker of Ohio statesmen—a sort of Buckeye Warwick. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

How much fat Mr. Burdell fried out of the Federal employees I do not know. In round numbers, there are about 200,000 of them, with salaries ranging from $50,000 down. Assuming that the average salary is $1,000, we have a total of $200,000,000; and assuming further that the average "free-will offering" in the cause of reform under the thumbscrew process of Mr. Burdell was 10 per cent, the result is $20,000,000—a neat sum to be expended in conducting a pure election in a Republican State. Mr. Burdell may have received and disbursed more or less. He knows; and, if it will not disturb the equanimity of my learned friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], late chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, I suggest that he introduce a resolution to appoint a committee with power to send for persons and papers to ascertain precisely how much blackmail Burdell received from Federal officials; and, while he is at it, to have a committee of exploration appointed to discover whether the Civil Service Commission has been kidnapped or destroyed or in any manner curtailed of its fair proportions or has become a mere tender to the Republican party. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Contemplating these two stupendous victories of Republican spoilsmen, and varying the famous words of Wellington at Waterloo, I say, "Up, reformers, and at them!"

If the President takes ten more such steps backward, the civil service reform system will be a schoolboy's tale, the wonder of an hour; and if Burdell is allowed to run at large and to raid Federal employees when he pleases, Congress will soon be called on to establish a soup house here in Washington for their sustenance, for the money he squeezed out of them in 1899 in order to carry Ohio is not a drop in the bucket compared with the vast sum the Republicans will need to carry the country in 1900.

If Burdell and his ilk are not choked off, Federal employees had, one and all, better take the benefit of the bankrupt law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

GENERAL GROSVENOR AND THE WILSON BILL.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Out in my county there dwelt a lawyer, Col. George W. Anderson, who for four years was a member of this House. He was always a brilliant orator, but in his younger days not well up in the technicalities of his profession. On one occasion he was about to be knocked out of court when Judge Porter, who was presiding—a very kind-hearted man—undertook to help him by saying: "Colonel Anderson, are you taken by surprise?" Whereupon Anderson electrified bench and bar by replying: "Good God, your honor! I am not only surprised, but utterly astounded!" [Great laughter.]

I was likewise astounded when I heard the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, say that the Wilson tariff bill was a free-trade measure. [Laughter.] There is nowhere on earth or under the earth or in the air above the earth a scintilla of evidence on which to base that statement. It is absolutely preposterous. That bill carried an average tariff duty of nearly 40 per cent on about 4,000 articles of everyday consumption. Surely no sane man can believe or does believe that such a bill was a free-trade measure. Free traders voted for it holding their noses. They voted for it because it was the best they could get and cut down the rates of the McKinley bill of abominations about 8 per cent. It is a poor cause that necessitates such wrenching of historic facts to support it and only shows to what straits Republicans are driven to defend their present course.

A characterless, obscure, and ignorant stump speaker might be excused for making such a groundless assertion in the heat of debate out in the backwoods of Ohio, but General GROSVENOR can not be excused on any such theory. He can not afford to make such a ridiculous statement. He certainly can not be excused on the grounds of ignorance, for one of his foibles is omniscience; nor on grounds of inexperience, for he has long since passed the effervescent period of youth; sixty-six winters have frosted his head with silver, and he is a veteran, a conspicuous, an able member of this House. He is a great historic personage [laughter]; younger men look to him for guidance. He is the only real, simon-pure, major prophet now known to be on terra firma.

The public regards him as a sort of walking delegate for the Administration [laughter], its mouthpiece on this floor, the keeper of the king's conscience and groom of the Presidential posset.

He owes it to his own fame, to the dignity of this House, and to the cause of truth and justice to expunge that charge from his speech, for it is baseless as the fabric of a vision.

THE PENDING CURRENCY BILL.

"Consistency's a jewel." If the philosopher who wrote that famous sentence should return to earth and should find himself among the Republican majority of the House of Representatives, he would feel as lonesome as Adam before Eve impinged upon his enraptured vision or as Alexander Selkirk in the oppressive solitude of his desert island.

If Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, were speaking as of the political morals of the supporters of "the Atlantic City money bill," he would change his far-resounding exclamation: "Frailty, thy name is woman!" so as to read: "Frailty, thy name is latter-day Republicanism!"

With consciences of India rubber and cheeks of Hindoo gods, Republican Representatives and Senators are now doing the very thing which we charged in 1896 they would do, if given sufficient power, which charge Republican orators and editors west of the Alleghenies with one accord denied as bitterly and vehemently as Peter denied his Lord and Master. I suppose I owe an apology to the memory of the great apostle for placing him even temporarily in such ignoble company and make amends by stating at once the historic fact that he made noble atonement for his one act of weakness and unfaithfulness—an example which Republicans are not liable to emulate. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The die is cast. Hugh H. Hanna and his confreres are anxious for the sacrifice. The majority here are eager to do his bidding. Argument has about the same effect upon Republican Representatives as it would if addressed to "the dull, cold ear of death." This House will pass "the Atlantic City money bill," and the Senate will pass it or something equally as bad. No Republican will dare to oppose it for two reasons—fear of the caucus lash and fear of being divorced from the pie counter. Our appeal is not to the members of this House, but to those who make and unmake Representatives—the great body of the American people. In them we place our trust and not in those who are looking hungrily to the White House for favors to come.

History frequently repeats itself—a fact that gives the minority both confidence and consolation.

Thomas Campbell says:

I watch the wheels of Nature's mazy plan,
And learn the future by the past of man.

That is a good rule by which to judge. Let us apply it to this bill.

At the behest of Nicholas Biddle a supple Congress passed a bill to recharter the old Bank of the United States, and its members fondly hoped that they had thereby made their calling and election sure, if not to mansions in the skies, at least to good, fat offices; but, fortunately for the cause of constitutional government and of human liberty, at that time there sat in the Presidential chair one of the purest and bravest patriots that ever lived, the iron soldier of the Hermitage, Andrew Jackson, of blessed and immortal memory, who promptly vetoed that obnoxious and dangerous measure.

Both parties to that Titanic struggle appealed to the people, and after a historical contest Jackson was triumphantly reelected by an overwhelming majority, receiving 239 electoral votes to 49 for his opponent. The people stood faithfully by Jackson because he stood unflinchingly by the people. Unfortunately we have no Andrew Jackson in the White House now to veto this infamous measure, but upon the appeal to the people in 1900 William J. Bryan will be indorsed by as great a majority as was Andrew Jackson in 1832.

REPUBLICANS EAT THEIR OWN WORDS.

Nearly all the great Republicans who have lived since 1873—Grant, Garfield, Blaine, John Sherman, Logan, Grosvenor, Allison, Don Cameron, Windom, Joseph G. Cannon [laughter], Hepburn, Dolliver [laughter], Matthew Stanley Quay, William E. Chandler, and others, as the sale bills say, "too tedious to mention" [laughter], have condemned the main features of "the Atlantic City money bill" by tongue or pen or vote. The silver speeches, the greenback speeches, and the anti-single-gold-standard speeches of Republican Senators and Representatives, now stultifying themselves by supporting this iniquitous measure, would if collected make a volume larger than the Bible. In the light of their votes now those speeches will constitute rare, rich, and racy reading when their authors are arraigned at the bar of public opinion. Out of their own mouths will these high and lofty political somersaulters be condemned.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY RECANTS.

Of all the eminent Republicans who, first and last, have championed silver, President William McKinley is facile princeps.

In Congress he not only spoke eloquently and unanswerably for silver, but he voted for the Stanley Mathews resolution, for the original Bland bill, for the Bland bill with the Senate amendments, and his name is recorded in the roll of honor of those who voted to pass the Bland-Allison bill over the veto of pseudo-President Hayes.

[Here the hammer fell. By unanimous consent, Mr. CLARK was allowed five minutes more time.]

In Congress he made this wise and patriotic utterance:

I am for the largest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it. I would give it equal credit and honor with gold. I would make no discrimination. I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

That is a sound declaration, well worthy of remembrance.

At Toledo, Ohio, February 12, 1891, he excoriated Grover Cleveland for being hostile to silver in a highly artistic manner, as follows:

During all of his years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own great products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored, even before his inauguration to office, to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards, and to the end of his Administration, persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce and therefore dear. He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else its servant. He was not thinking of "the poor" then. He had left "their side." He was not "standing forth in their defense." Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly. Was there ever more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption?

In reading those glowing words I am constrained to exclaim in the language of the immortal Squeers: "Here's richness!" And it appears to me that the President, having recanted the opinions he then held, should telegraph his apologies to his great prototype, "the Sage of Princeton," in whose footsteps he is now walking so faithfully and so enthusiastically. [Laughter.]

But an astounding change has come over the spirit of his dream, and he now "urgently recommends, to support the gold standard," a measure which not only establishes by law the gold standard, but which practically retires the greenbacks, thereby contracting the volume of the currency by $346,000,000, reduces silver coins to mere token money, gives carte blanche to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds, abdicates the paramount function of government—that of regulating the quantity of money—and turns the financial interests of the country over to the tender mercies of the National Bank Association, conferring upon it the power to expand or contract the volume of our circulating medium at will, a power too vast and too dangerous to be intrusted to any private persons or to any corporation whatsoever.

Here are the exact words of his message. They constitute his latest utterance. He says:

In its earlier history the national banking act seemed to prove a reasonable avenue through which needful additions to the circulation could from time to time be made. Changing conditions have apparently rendered it now inoperative to that end. The high margin in bond securities required, resulting from large premiums which Government bonds command in the market, or the tax on note issues, or both operating together, appear to be the influences which impair its public utility.

The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to this important matter with the view of ascertaining whether or not such reasonable modifications can be made in the national banking act as will render its service in the particulars here referred to more responsive to the people's needs. I again urge that national banks be authorized to organize with a capital of $25,000.

I urgently recommend that to support the existing gold standard, and to maintain the parity in value of the two metals (gold and silver) and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the market and in the payment of debts, the Secretary of the Treasury be given additional power and charged with the duty to sell United States bonds and to other effective means as may be necessary to these ends.

The authority should include the power to sell bonds on long and short time, as conditions may require, and should provide for a rate of interest lower than that fixed by the act of January 14, 1875. While there is now no commercial fright which withdraws gold from the Government, but, on the contrary, such widespread confidence that gold seeks the Treasury demanding paper money in exchange, yet the very situation points to the present as the most fitting time to make adequate provision to insure the continuance of the gold standard and of public confidence in the ability and purpose of the Government to meet all its obligations in the money which the civilized world recognizes as the best. The financial transactions of the Government are conducted upon a gold basis.

We receive gold when we sell United States bonds and use gold for their payment. We are maintaining the parity of all the money issued or coined by authority of the Government. We are doing these things with the means at hand. Happily at the present time we are not compelled to resort to loans to supply gold. It has been done in the past, however, and may have to be done in the future. It behooves us, therefore, to provide at once the best means to meet the emergency when it arises, and the best means are those which are most certain and economical. Those now authorized have the virtue neither of directness nor economy.

We have already eliminated one of the causes of our financial plight and embarrassment during the years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896. Our receipts now equal our expenditures; deficient revenues no longer create alarm. Let us remove the only remaining cause by conferring the full and necessary power on the Secretary of the Treasury, and impose upon him the duty to uphold the present gold standard and preserve the coins of the two metals on a parity with each other, which is the repeatedly declared policy of the United States.

In this connection I repeat my former recommendations, that a portion of the gold holdings shall be placed in a trust fund, from which greenbacks shall be redeemed upon presentation, but when once redeemed shall not thereafter be paid out except for gold.

I have no unkindness in my heart toward the President. I repeat now in this distinguished presence, what I have said repeatedly elsewhere, that he is a gracious, graceful, tactful, agreeable gentleman. As a Presidential politician he ranks with Martin Van Buren and Abraham Lincoln. He is never in advance of his party. He never lags behind it. He keeps abreast of it. His finger is constantly on the Republican pulse; his ear close to the Republican heart to catch its every throb. His position may always be safely taken as the position of the Republican majority.

So far as I know, he is the only occupant of the White House that ever by an oratorical tour elected enough of his party to the House of Representatives to change into a majority what would otherwise have been a minority. With consummate skill he converted popular enthusiasm for his high position to partisan advantage, a performance which can be complained of, if at all, only on grounds of taste. Whether to his "swing around the circle" may be applied the old Latin dictum "de gustibus non est disputandum" I shall not now undertake to say.

I assume that the President spoke and voted his honest sentiments when voting and speaking for silver in the years ago and that he voices his honest sentiments now in "urgently recommending" Congress to legislate in support of the single gold standard, but surely the evolutionary process in his case has been as miraculous and radical, if not as swift, as was that of Saul of Tarsus, who began his religious career by persecuting the early Christians and ended by becoming the chief propagandist of their faith; for from his official coigne of vantage the President speaks as one having authority—at least to a majority of this House, and, I have no doubt, to a majority of the other House.

"I urgently recommend that to support the existing gold standard," etc., says the President. Not only recommends, but "urgently" recommends. The chances are a thousand to one that had he uttered that sentiment in the campaign of 1896 he would not now be in position to send a message to Congress and there would be no gold-standard Congress to receive it. It was the pledge in the St. Louis platform to secure bimetalism by international agreement that landed him in the White House. So says Hon. JOHN M. THURSTON, Republican Senator from Nebraska.

The pledge of international bimetalism held enough Silver Republicans in line to give the election to Mr. McKinley.

REPUBLICAN DECEPTION IN 1896.

Indeed, all over the Western country we declared what we believed then to be true, and what we know now, that if the Republicans carried the country they would establish the gold standard by law. They denied the charge with indignation and boldly and falsely asseverated that they were better silver men than we were—that they were advocating a practicable and we an impracticable theory of restoring silver to its ancient place of honor in the coinage system of the world. Marvelous to tell, multiplied thousands believed them, swallowed the bait, and voted with them—which is proof positive that all the fools are not dead yet, or at any rate were not dead in 1896.

It will not do for Western Republican gold-standard advocates to say now that they are occupying in 1899 the same position they held in 1896, for by so doing they give the lie direct to nearly every Republican speaker who appeared upon the stump west of the Alleghenies in the Presidential campaign and to every Republican editor who supported Mr. McKinley throughout all that vast region.

Furthermore, they are estopped by their multifarious declarations in public speech and in the public press from now denying that the plank in favor of bimetalism by international agreement was placed in the platform in good faith, or that they then believed bimetalism to be correct in principle or that they intended to honestly endeavor to secure it in the manner therein proposed.

Should they enter such denial now, they would write themselves down as the most conscienceless set of tricksters and jugglers that ever played upon the credulity of a confiding people. It would be decidedly interesting to know precisely what Senator WOLCOTT, of Colorado, and the other American International Bimetallic Commissioners think of the sincerity of purpose of this Administration in the futile endeavor to secure bimetalism by international agreement.

Their candid opinion of the interview of Hon. Lyman J. Gage, with which he hamstrung them just as they were about to succeed in securing bimetalism by international agreement and brought all their labors to an inglorious conclusion, would contribute largely to the gayety of nations, if not to the gayety of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have often imagined the junior Senator from the Centennial State chewing the bitter cud of disappointment and repeating Tennyson's apostrophe to the ocean:

On the cold, gray stones, O sea!
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.

Perhaps in the fullness of time he may unbosom himself, and if he ever does my prediction is that "WOLCOTT on Lyman" will rank with "Demosthenes on the Crown" or with Cicero when he thundered against Catiline.

There is one great advantage growing out of the present situation. The atmosphere is cleared. Hereafter, so far as gold and silver are concerned, it is the single gold standard in its baldness and badness against bimetalism. Certainly there can be no subterfuge, no paltering in a double sense hereafter. The Republican who next year goes yawning about the country claiming to be in favor of international bimetalism is likely to be hooted from the hustings.

If obtaining offices by false pretenses were a felony, as is obtaining money or property, the entire Republican party could be sent to the penitentiary for their conduct in carrying the election of 1896, thereby gobbling up the Presidency and something like 200,000 fat appointive offices; for it is a patent fact that they carried the election by advocating one proposition and are now enacting another and an entirely different proposition into law.

In 1896 both Democrats and Republicans declared for bimetalism—Democrats by independent American action, Republicans through international agreement. The Palmer-Buckner contingent, a mere bagatelle, were the only avowed single gold-standard advocates that year. They were the vanguard of the Republican army. The numerous and gorgeous bouquets which Republicans are throwing to each other for being goldbugs ought to go to the Palmerites of 1896. Republicans are only eleventh-hour converts. I am for giving the devil his due, and to the Palmerites belong the honor or dishonor of this bill.

PALMER CHIEF REPUBLICAN.

Gen. John M. Palmer is the real Republican leader. He blazed the way. He made the mark which Republicans are compelled to toe. They are three years late, but they are coming up to the scratch. Unless gratitude is a lost virtue, instead of sequestering General Palmer on a meager pension pittance of $50 per month, the national bankers, whose faithful servant he was, ought to dress him in purple and fine linen, stuff him with mushrooms, ortolan, tongues of humming birds, and flamingoes, terrapin, and canvas-back duck so long as he lives, and then rear to his memory a lofty monument, on which should be chiseled these words:

This man led the Republicans into committing the most colossal act of bad faith recorded in the entire annals of the human race.

REPUBLICAN FINANCIAL PLANK IN 1896.

In order that there may be no mistake about it, I here quote the financial plank of the St. Louis platform:

The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of the law providing for the resumption of specie payments in 1879; since then every dollar has been as good as gold.

We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved. All our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard—the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

I undertake to say that William McKinley owes his election to the twelve words, "Except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world." At least so says Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER, Republican Senator from New Hampshire, and he ought to know, for he has had a good deal to do with Republican politics.

A QUEER CONTENTION.

Senator JOSEPH BENSON FORAKER, of Ohio, and Hermann H. Kohlsaat, editor and owner of the Chicago Times-Herald and the Chicago Evening Post, are at the present juncture engaged in a heated controversy as to which of them belongs the honor of having written that plank of the St. Louis platform. I understand that Mr. Kohlsaat keeps what he claims to be the original draft of that wondrous and wicked straddle, in his own handwriting, framed and hanging above his desk as evidence that he is the author.

I suppose that Senator FORAKER carries around in his inside pocket next his heart a copy in his handwriting; but I make bold to predict that the day is not far distant when Mr. Kohlsaat will be perfectly willing that Senator FORAKER shall have the dubious honor of its paternity, and that Senator FORAKER will be eager to unload the obloquy attaching to it upon the shoulders of Mr. Kohlsaat; for I am certain, absolutely certain, that not only the United States but the whole world will return to bimetalism under an impulse of self-preservation too strong to be resisted.

In that day every man who had any hand in constructing that miserable and infamous straddle and every man who stood by consenting will hasten to disclaim any connection with that performance, which will stink in the nostrils of mankind. With that straddle staring them in the face, why are the Republicans in such a hurry to pass this monstrous measure? The solution of this apparent riddle is not far to seek. The national banks furnished a large portion of the vast sum of money used to carry the election of 1896, and they now demand their reward and are now foreclosing their mortgage on the Republican party.

THE OHIO FINANCIAL STRADDLE OF 1896.

As for months prior to the St. Louis convention Mr. McKinley was the leading Republican Presidential candidate—indeed, the inevitable nominee—it is not unreasonable to assume that the financial plank of the Ohio platform of that year reflected his sentiments on that subject. It has been denounced and ridiculed as a most skillful "straddle," but such as it is, it must have met with his approval. Whatever else it may be, it is not a declaration in favor of the single gold standard. Having quoted his message to show his position now, I quote the Ohio financial plank of 1896 to show his position then. Gaze upon that picture, then on this:

We contend for honest money, a currency of gold, silver, and paper, with which to measure our exchange that shall be as sound as the Government itself and as untarnished as its honor; and to that end we favor bimetalism and demand the use of both gold and silver as a standard money, either in accordance with a ratio to be fixed by an international agreement, if that can be obtained, or under such restrictions and such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parities of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of gold, silver, or paper, shall at all times be equal.

With a considerable rhetorical flourish that "straddle" was intended to be "all things to all men," hoping thereby to win votes for Ohio's favorite son at St. Louis. But the convention kicked that "straddle" out of the door and got up a "straddle" of its own, sufficiently ingenious to rope in enough of the unwary to elect Mr. McKinley. Truly 1896 was a good year for catching gudgeons.

All entomologists know that in nature there is a process of transition marked by three steps—larva, chrysalis, butterfly. In their progression Republicans have developed three statuses: Free silverites, international bimetalists, goldbugs; and according to my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] they are now one and all full-fledged golden-winged butterflies. They have all bowed the knee to Baal.

WHY URGENCY?

Why this "urgency" on the part of the President in recommending the support of the gold standard? Is it a fear that our much-vaunted prosperity is about to vanish as a dream? It must be so, for he gives this reason for his "urgency":

While there is now no commercial fright which withdraws gold from the Government, but, on the contrary, such widespread confidence that gold seeks the Treasury demanding paper money in exchange, yet the very situation points to the present as the most fitting time to make adequate provision to insure the continuance of the gold standard.

No question that the fear is there and that if the gold standard is not established by law now it can never be so established. Hence this hot haste.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?

Particularly when we have been led to believe that this Administration caused the rains to fall, the sun to shine, and the crops to grow in America; produced a famine abroad, and scattered the golden nuggets in Alaska.

But stranger still, the President says:

Happily at the present time we are not compelled to resort to loans to supply gold. It has been done in the past, and—may have to be done in the future.

"If ye have tears, prepare to shed them now!"—

So that, notwithstanding we are daily and hourly assured that we are now enjoying the greatest prosperity in our history, the President is actually contemplating a recurrence to bond issues, for in another place, in asking for more power to the Secretary of the Treasury, he says:

The authority should include the power to sell bonds on long and short time, as conditions may arise.

Wonders will never cease. A great many persons believe that the Secretary of the Treasury now has too much power touching the sale of bonds. Nevertheless, the President asks for more, and, sad to say, he will get it. National banks get what they ask from this Administration. The people get nothing but orders to pay more taxes; but a day of reckoning will come as certain as a just God reigns on high.

16 TO 1.

Certain Representatives from the East, rated as Democrats in the Directory and newspapers, avow their purpose to vote for this bill. In so doing they are out of touch with the great body of the party. The vast majority of Democrats are as much in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver as they ever were. Not as a matter of expediency, but as a matter of principle they and I believe in the Second Declaration of Independence with our whole hearts. The true situation might as well be clearly understood first as last, and it is this: We intend to readopt—not simply reaffirm, but readopt—the financial plank of the Chicago platform, word for word, syllable by syllable, abating neither jot nor tittle of that great confession of Democratic faith.

The free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the historical ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the consent of any other nation on earth, will be the supreme issue in 1900, as it was in 1896. Upon that platform we will place Bryan and elect him. Self-seeking politicians, timorous souls, may fall away from us, but the paramount issue and the peerless candidate will remain. Politicians do not make issues. The people make them. And they make something else. They make politicians, and when politicians do not do to suit them they unmake the politicians and make a new set who will do to suit them. The plain Democrats—those who seek no office and who expect none—know exactly what they want. They want Bryan and the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at 16 to 1, and these they intend to have. We would stultify ourselves by changing position in front of the enemy. Even as a matter of expediency we would lose by such a move, for every time we gained one vote in the East we would lose two or three or a half dozen in the South and West. To abandon the Chicago platform would not only be wrong. It would be suicidal.

Of course other issues will be presented, but they will be subsidiary to that of the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at 16 to 1. We will have strong anti-trust and anti-imperialistic planks—strong as language can make them. Also a plank in favor of an income tax, and another in favor of economy in the public service, that labor may be lightly burdened. But the overshadowing issue—the one on which the decisive battle will be fought, and on which the victory will be won—is free coinage of gold and silver at the old ratio of 16 to 1, without asking anybody's consent or waiting for anybody's assistance. This is the programme, and gentlemen may as well govern themselves accordingly. One swallow does not make a summer. The desertion of a soldier now and then does not portend that the silver hosts are either dejected or disintegrating. We know we are right, and we will persevere until complete victory perches upon our banner.

The average citizen has more sense than he is credited with, and he knows that the prosperity so widely bruited here grows out of accidental and ephemeral causes which have turned the balance of trade in our favor, which have increased our stock of gold; that should the balance of trade turn against us, as it may do next year, this country will be drained of its gold and times will grow harder, and, having no adequate quantity of basic money, conditions will be worse than during the panic of 1893. Therefore he is for silver—all we can get of it by free and unlimited coinage at 16 to 1. Consequently, he does not intend to permit that issue to be side-tracked, shunted out of the way, or overshadowed by any other issue, and the Democratic politician who tries to play him that trick will get his neck broken off as short as you can break a piece of glass. If we were right in 1896, we are right now, and we propose to stand by our guns, neither asking nor giving quarter.

AS TO PROSPERITY.

You Republicans exploit the prosperity which you claim is universal and enduring. It is not true. It is largely fictitious and altogether sporadic. What does it profit a farmer to have a rise of a few cents a bushel on his oats, wheat, corn, and potatoes above the prices of the panic year of 1893, and at the same time pay double and in some cases triple rates for what he buys? You claim, furthermore, that this boasted prosperity has been produced by reason of the fact that we have been on the gold standard. This is not true. It is the old and condemned fallacy of "Cum hoc, ergo propter hoc." Your logic in syllogistic form would run in this wise: "The gold standard produces prosperity; we have the gold standard; therefore our prosperity was produced by the gold standard. Q. E. D."

To overthrow that reasoning I will quote the ideas, if not the exact words, of a Republican authority as high and mighty as any here, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, the most ably conducted Republican newspaper in America, bitter as gall in its partisanship.

Not long since it had a flaming editorial congratulating the Republic of Mexico on her unprecedented prosperity. It was the finest and most glowing editorial that I have read in that paper in many a day.

Now, it is a fact known of all men, that the Republic of Mexico is on the silver standard. Consequently on the "Cum hoc, ergo propter hoc" theory, the syllogism would be stated thus: "Mexico is prosperous; Mexico has the silver standard; therefore the silver standard produces prosperity. Q. E. D."

Let's try this method of reasoning once more: "A bank broke in Boston to-day; we have the gold standard; therefore the failure of the bank was caused by the gold standard. Q. E. D."

By that sort of reasoning any proposition, however absurd, may be established.

INDECENT HASTE.

The indecent and inexcusable haste with which this bill is being railroaded through must forever remain a blot upon the history of the Republican majority of the Fifty-sixth Congress; and you need not be surprised if in the days to come this unseemly and outrageous precedent arises to plague its inventors. All summer the leaders of the majority have known the provisions of this bill and have had months in which to prepare their arguments. The minority had one week day in which to prepare for battle on a bill which revolutionizes our entire financial system.

If this had been simply an anti-silver bill, little preparation would have been needed; but this bill goes much further. It makes token money of silver, converts $500,000,000 of silver coin and certificates from an asset into a debt of the Government, to be redeemed in gold, practically retires the greenbacks, multiplies the power of the national banks—placing the prosperity of 70,000,000 persons within their keeping—and gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to issue bonds ad libitum. It broadens the financial question and lifts it to the high plane on which Andrew Jackson and the old Bank of the United States fought it out more than a half century ago, and for the discussion of this momentous question, which affects the welfare and happiness of every man, woman, and child in the Republic and of all the teeming millions yet to be, about twenty-seven hours of daylight have been permitted, that, too, without the bill ever having been referred to or considered by any committee of the House. Parliamentary tyranny can go little further and do little worse; but it is an old saying that "It's a long lane that has no turn," and history shows that majorities frequently dwindle into minorities, and our turn will surely come at last.

Do the people want silver coin converted into mere token money? They are not such idiots as to desire such wanton waste, for if it is to be mere token money, to be redeemed in gold, why waste fifty-odd cents in silver to make a token dollar, when 1 cent's worth of paper would do as well?

Do the people desire to convert 500,000,000 silver dollars, now an asset of the Government, good for the payment of all obligations, public and private, into a debt of that amount, thereby really diminishing their wealth by twice the amount of silver coin now outstanding? Surely they are not so insane. Do they hanker after a new and unlimited issue of bonds? Certainly they have not yet taken leave of their senses.

Is there any popular demand for the retirement of the $346,000,000 of greenbacks, thereby contracting the currency by that amount? Who says that we have too much money now? Let it never be forgotten that this bill practically retires the greenbacks and that that is its prime object, for nobody but a natural-born fool will be deceived by the euphemistic term "impounding."

The fondest dream of the national bankers for years has been to retire the greenbacks, and at last their dream is to be realized. Greenbacks are to be paid out for gold, are they? Tell that tale to the marines. The bankers have all the gold now, and they will never permit it to be exchanged for greenbacks in large quantities. They are not simpletons, even if Republican Congressmen are. I make this prediction now, without fear of successful contradiction, that after this bill becomes a law greenbacks in the hands of the people will be scarce as hen's teeth—like angels' visits, few and far between. A few of the one-dollar greenbacks, for the sake of auld lang syne, will be retained, framed, and displayed as curiosities to our children as samples of the money that saved the life of the Republic in the awful period of the civil war; but nearly all the greenbacks will remain forever in their long home—the newly created "division of issue and redemption."

Do the great body of the people wish the Government to abdicate its paramount function and to deliver the nation's prosperity, perhaps its life, unreservedly and absolutely into the hands of the National Bankers' Association? There has never been a day since Washington was first inaugurated when they so desired. They do not now so desire; and I warn gentlemen who are pampering these banks now and surrendering to them the rights which we temporarily hold in trust for the people that they will rue this day.

I recall to their memories the startling fact that in 1795, when Great Britain was engaged in a death struggle with Napoleon, the governors of the Bank of England emphatically, treasonably, and curtly, in a six-line letter, informed the younger Pitt that he could have no more money from that institution with which to fight the wonderful warrior whose towering ambition was universal dominion. Give to our national banks all power over our currency, as this bad bill proposes to do, and perhaps, indeed most likely, in some crisis of our country's fate, when we are engaged in a death struggle with some great power, it may be with all the great powers of the world, they, too, will play the traitor's part—withdraw from the Government the sinews of war, and thereby imperil our liberty, our happiness, and our prosperity. I enter the solemn protest of the great constituency which I represent against such monstrous folly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I have kept quiet during the general debate, and I should like to have fifteen minutes, if the House will grant that time to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended to fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, in the time accorded to me I do not intend to discuss any of the features of this bill. I have been fully satisfied from what I have heard from both sides that my vote should be cast in favor of this measure.

In listening to the debate from the other side of the House two distinguished members of the Democratic party frankly and openly admitted that the country again had great prosperity. One was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and the other was the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] did not undertake to show that the cause of our prosperity came from any other source than the election of President McKinley and the restoration of the Republican party to power.

He admitted that their position on the money question and on the other questions that affected the interests of this country had brought about the prosperity we now enjoy, and then concluded his remarks by saying that he would not vote for this measure. That gentleman in the Fifty-third Congress was one of the idols of the Democratic party and of the Free Silver party. I remember him standing on that side of the Hall wildly applauded by every Free Silverite for his speech on that subject, wherein he predicted that unless we should have free and unlimited coinage of silver, disaster and ruin would overtake the country. The gentleman now admits that he was mistaken. Yesterday the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in a masterly and forcible argument, presented his side of the case, and we all on both sides of this House listened to his eloquent speech with great pleasure, because the gentleman is always worth listening to whether we agree with him or not.

After presenting his side of the case against the gold standard he admitted the prosperity of the country, and the reason which the gentleman from Texas assigned why our country was prosperous was as follows (he was not as fair as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who frankly admitted that it came from Republican rule): The gentleman from Texas, after thanking God that the country was prosperous, that our mills were all in operation, and our looms were all moving, stated that it was Divine Providence that had brought prosperity to this country and not the Republican party. He spoke of the famine in far-away India; he said that the Almighty in His providence had afflicted those people with a famine, and that he gave as a reason why this country is prosperous.

Why, Mr. Chairman, what use have the famine-stricken people of India for the products of this country? Famine in India never turned a solitary wheel in the United States. Famine in India never lighted a solitary furnace in this country. When the people of India are stricken with famine they have no use for our structural iron; they have no use for our clothing; they have no use for our great locomotives; they have no use for anything except one thing. A famine-stricken country has only one cry, and that cry is, "Give us bread!" If there is famine in India to-day, the only cry that will come from that land is, "Give us bread; give us bread!" Now, that plea was not worthy of the gentleman from the State of Texas. He should have confessed, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], that the prosperity of our country was brought about by Republican rule.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] had the courage to do it, and it would have been more worthy of the gentleman from Texas if, instead of attributing our great prosperity to the famine in India, he had stated that it was brought about by the Republican party. He should have prayed for more courage. I am reminded of an occurrence which happened after the battle of Spotsylvania, and men on that side of the House and on this who were engaged in that struggle will freely admit that for the number of men engaged it was the bloodiest battle of the civil war and of all time. General Longstreet, who commanded a corps in that fight, says that on the evening following he happened to wander into a tent where they were holding a prayer meeting.

A Confederate soldier belonging to the headquarters guard was a devoted and pious man, a man in whom all had confidence, and he was leading the prayer meeting. The general stood in the rear of the tent and heard the following—they knew another conflict was to come, and this soldier who was leading the meeting said: "Oh, Lord, give us more courage for the coming conflict of the morrow." A rough, rugged fellow who was in the tent said to him, "Bill, what in thunder are you praying about courage for? We have got more of that than we can use. Why in hell don't you pray for more grub?" Now, the gentleman from Texas should pray for more courage, like the soldier who made that prayer.

I have listened to those gentlemen and their speeches carefully. I have failed to see a remedy which they can offer better than the remedy now given the people by the Republican party. What are they aiming at? I find nothing in their argument. They remind me of an incident that occurred when the Confederate raiders came down the Cumberland Valley. Approaching the city of Harrisburg, a squadron of them commenced firing across the river. The news was carried to Governor Curtin at the capitol, and he sent this telegram to President Lincoln:

DEAR PRESIDENT: The Confederate cavalry are in sight of the city of Harrisburg and they are firing. There is not a Union soldier within 250 miles of the city.

And the great Lincoln, in his quaint way, replied:

DEAR GOVERNOR: Will you be kind enough to inform me what the Confederates are firing at?

I would like to know what the gentlemen on the other side are firing at. We have had some firing going on for a week and during that whole time only two men have candidly acknowledged the truth, and that is that we are prosperous and at the high-water mark of prosperity in this country. But then the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] was intended to stop the Republicans in their victorious march toward the Presidential election of 1900, and as great as his speech was in its way, and extraordinary as it was, I want to say to gentlemen on the other side it will not stop the onward march of the Republican party to victory in 1900. It reminds me of another incident of the civil war. In 1861, after the battle of Bull Run, Governor Curtin, whose patriotism and enthusiasm got away with him, telegraphed to Lincoln that if he would give him authority he would stop the war. He knew that he had 700,000 fighting men in his State. The President telegraphed back: "Your patriotic offer is received, but I am compelled to say to you that your stopper is not big enough."

I want to say to gentlemen on the other side, when this great country is prospering, with the demand for goods a year ahead, with the great warehouses empty, and the demand away beyond the supply, we propose to hold a convention in the city of Philadelphia on the 19th of next June and renominate President McKinley, and I can speak for my State that after the election in the following November we shall give the President 350,000 majority. [Applause on the Republican side.] The working people and the manufacturing and business men of my State, regardless of party, do not propose ever again that you gentlemen shall lay your hands upon the great interests of this country, as you did in Cleveland's free-trade Administration, and destroy the great industries of the country. They are now in the full blaze of prosperity, and we propose to go on.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I do not propose to discuss this bill. I listened to the careful analysis of this bill made by the gentleman from Indiana who has the bill in charge. I am satisfied from his analysis that it is right. I have tried to master this money question. I read books on free silver and on sound money, and at last tackled the report of Mr. Walker, of Massachusetts, and after reading that three times serious symptoms of wheels in the head came to the surface [laughter], and I came to the conclusion that if I did not want to go mad and be taken to some lunatic asylum I would have to let it alone. [Renewed laughter.] So that, after having listened to the careful analysis of the bill given by the gentleman from Indiana, and knowing the ability and experience of the committee which reported it, I propose to vote for the gold standard.

I am very glad that the gentleman from Tennessee did not have any of my speeches on this question that he could quote from. But in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses I was a new member and did not get a chance to put myself in favor of the free coinage of silver [laughter]; and so I take my place now in favor of the gold standard, and if my people should allow me to remain here long enough, I hope I may not have reason to recant and recall this declaration upon the floor of this House or elsewhere. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I must ask for the reading of the next section. Let the bill progress a little. There is nothing before the House but by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Several gentlemen have expressed a desire for recognition, and the Chair can not presume that they do propose to address themselves to the section.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. SULZER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SULZER. Is it in order now to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been read for the purpose of amendment. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York. Mr. LEVY proceeded to address the Chair.

Mr. OVERSTREET. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the last three words.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, while this bill in all its features is not the best bill that might be presented for enactment, and while I regret that no opportunity has been given to us either to amend or consider it in committee, I am prepared to vote for it, confident in the hope that it will meet in conference the same fate that every other important measure originating in this House has met with, and that it will emerge purged of some of its imperfections and, in that respect at least, a better bill.

While I have the opportunity I would like to say, in this connection, a few words regarding the attacks on New York. Every currency bill or financial measure which comes before this House for discussion is made the pretext for these unjust attacks. She is characterized as the abiding place of all the evils that ever have afflicted or ever will afflict this Government and as the home and refuge of all the enemies who seek to destroy the welfare of our nation. These denunciations have been unnoticed because it was believed they were prompted either by ignorance or malice, and the former could not be cured by instruction, while the latter did not disturb the peace of the citizens of our great metropolis. But wherein lies the reason for these charges and calumnies? New York rejoices in the prosperity which has come to every State in the Union, and her own prosperity is only an index of the advancement of our country. She does not hoard her wealth; she is constantly applying it to the betterment of the various sections of our country seeking her aid.

She builds railroads and highways. She sells your securities and finds a market for your properties. She is the clearing house and clearing port of a majority of the States. She is their market for supplies to be purchased from or sent abroad. She controls, as it were, the markets of the world and brings them to your feet. She moves your crops and finds investment for money from East, North, West, and South. She does everything that brains can devise and activity carry out for the advancement of our Union. She has never been called upon by any section of this country in time of panic or disaster but she has responded quickly and generously. Her patriotic sons have been the first to offer themselves in defense of a nation's honor, and she has sustained and always will sustain the national pride with a dignity and a lavishness of outlay which should command the admiration of every sister city.

She should be looked upon as the product of the energy of this young nation, of which she is so intimate a part. You prosper when she prospers, you advance as she advances, and you fail when she fails. She is the great financial center of this greatest nation of the Western Hemisphere. She is the heart of that grand body of which these United States are members, and she supplies to the arteries of trade the stimulation and the energy which have made this country the healthy, powerful, aggressive nation it is, fit to stand shoulder to shoulder with the strongest nations of the world and ready to take the lead when it is properly equipped and when no doubt exists concerning its financial policy.

I am in entire sympathy with the chief purpose of this bill—the maintenance of the parity of all our money.

This was one of the most pronounced principles of the Democracy of Jefferson and of his followers in the apostleship of Democracy for generations.

I subscribe to his declaration that "The true proportions between the values of gold and silver is a mercantile problem altogether," and I welcome the company of converts to his views from whatever quarter. You gentlemen of the other side stand upon good Democratic ground, and the sound-money sentiment will rejoice over the courage you have displayed in exhibiting the possession of at least one conviction.

The enactment of this bill will remove from the arena of political agitation a question that of all questions is most disturbing to the material interests of the country. Any uncertainty respecting the standard of value for our currency, coinage, and bonded obligations tends to retard and cripple the business of the country at home and abroad, while certainty and fixedness upon that question stimulate and perpetuate the conditions that promote national and individual prosperity.

Gold is the standard to-day, the parity of the metals in the coinage of the country having been uniformly preserved, and an irrevocable declaration by statutory enactment that this shall always remain so has only become necessary because of the agitation of the last few years. The settlement of the question thus agitated, removing that question from the sphere of politics and serious controversy, must afford a mighty impetus to this nation in its progress in the fields of commerce and finance extending to all parts of the world, strengthened, as we shall be, by unimpeachable and unlimited credit at home and abroad and moving on to the manifest destiny of becoming the great commercial and financial center of the world.

The establishment by this bill of the gold standard makes also for economy in the expenditures of the country and relief from taxation. The rate of interest on Government bonds issued within recent years would have been as low as 2 per cent if on the face of the bonds the principal and interest had been made payable in gold, a saving of millions of dollars in interest.

The want of stability in the currency of a country tends to the accumulation of capital in the hands of the few and to the disadvantage of the masses.

The wage-earner suffers because his earnings are invariably based upon a depreciated currency, and he is paid in the coin having the least intrinsic value and lowest of purchasing power.

But this measure is not only sound in policy, it is sound also in ethics, in common honesty. There should be only one dollar, whether for public or private transactions, and common honesty, as well as sound policy, demands that the standard of value, whether in gold, silver, or paper, should be fixed according to the value of that form of the circulating medium the intrinsic value of which is the highest.

If—

we determine that a dollar shall be our unit, we must then say with precision what a dollar is. This coin, as struck at different times, of different weight and fineness, is of different values.

And so you have defined with precision the standard unit of value and the weight and the fineness thereof. As suggested by Jefferson, you have inquired into the market price of gold in the several countries with which we shall be principally connected in commerce. You have sent a commission abroad to ascertain if there was any escape from the conviction that has long lived in the commercial world respecting the standard of value, and it has returned with the report that there was none. You have studied the statistics of Mexico, China, and Japan, and have learned that the condition of the wage-earners in those countries is distressingly suggestive of debased currency and unsoundness of values. You have seen the leaders among the nations of the world adjust their finances to the gold basis and prepare for their share of the prosperity which is sweeping over the globe; and yet you have lagged in the race for financial and commercial supremacy till finally opportunism, under the sting of a public sentiment, has yielded to the demand for the distinct declaration embodied in the opening clause of this bill. [Applause.]

This bill assures the gold standard, and the restoration of confidence will speedily follow, but there still remain obstacles which retard a healthy advancement to prosperity.

The United States Government is absorbing each day, through taxation, millions of dollars, which, taken from the legitimate channels of trade and industry, are locked up in the vaults of the Treasury and help to swell an idle surplus. Undoubtedly serious financial difficulties will follow this withdrawal of active money, and the financial situation in the larger money centers will soon become acute. The Secretary of the Treasury from time to time seeks to relieve the money stringency by the purchase of bonds, but this, in my judgment, is a clumsy and uncertain method of affording relief in times of crises. The holders of bonds are unwilling to sell at the price offered by the Government when the market price for these same bonds is higher. The Secretary of the Treasury should be empowered to place the surplus accumulated from customs and other revenues with the national banks of this country, charging a rate of interest therefor to be fixed by him. This would release, in a businesslike manner, a part of the funds lying idle in the Treasury and give business men and banking circles the relief needed in critical times. Such a method would meet with approval in business circles and would secure a certain and available relief in times of money stringency.

In conclusion, I submit some correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and myself in which I directed his attention to an expedient which, in my judgment, was calculated to meet the demands of business, release the accumulated surplus in the Treasury, and make for the advancement of our national welfare. This correspondence was called forth by the following telegram, dated September 27, sent to the Secretary of the Treasury:

I respectfully suggest that you use every means possible to relieve the present tension in the money market. That in the midst of such extraordinary prosperity there should be a dearth of money to transact the country's business, the same being due solely to the absorption by the Treasury, through taxation, of the surplus, would be ludicrous were it not so costly to farmer, mechanic, and business man alike. Every resource should be exhausted to promptly end the present stringency.

This was answered by the following letter from Assistant Secretary Vanderlip, dated October 4:

Upon my return to Washington I find your telegram of the 27th ultimo addressed to Secretary Gage. The Secretary being absent from the city, it falls to me to reply to your statement that the scarcity of money is due "to the absorption by the Treasury, through taxation, of the surplus." The available cash balance held by the Treasury one year ago was, in round figures, $309,000,000. Now, October 3, 1899, it stands at $287,000,000, which is $22,000,000 less than a year ago. While the Treasury thus has $22,000,000 less than it had the same season last year, it has on deposit with national banks about $1,000,000 more. The exact figures are as follows:

Deposits with national banks October 3, 1898	$32,344,000
Deposits with national banks October 2, 1899	$3,183,000

It would thus seem that your premises are wrong. The Treasury is not absorbing the surplus money of the country. It would be well to bear in mind that our receipts and expenditures almost balance from day to day, so that there is scarcely any season when the Treasury is a factor in disturbing the equilibrium of the money market. When it has appeared that the Government was withdrawing funds from business channels, and thereby causing embarrassment, the head of the Department has invariably done what he could do legitimately to relieve the situation. You may recall that within a few weeks Secretary Gage, without solicitation, anticipated the payment of October interest to the extent of about $5,500,000, most of which, being payable in New York, doubtless contributed to relieve the situation there, either by reason of such actual addition to the money supply in New York or by the influence which the Department's action engendered.

In reply to this I wrote to Mr. Vanderlip as follows:

Your esteemed favor of the 4th instant received, and I regret my inability to agree with your conclusions. I assume, of course, that you do not wish to be understood as maintaining that the Treasury defends its present policy because under vastly different conditions existing a year ago there was little or no complaint. That the cash now held by the Treasury is less than it was a year ago, is no justification for tying up the whole of the enormous sum of $287,000,000, at a time when every industry is thriving and the demand for money from merchant, farmer, and mechanic most urgent.

The Treasury, by its present policy, puts a halter around the neck of every industry, cries halt to the progress which is the due of the enterprising and industrious, and gives unscrupulous manipulators an opportunity to cause an exorbitant rate of interest to prevail.

I call your attention to some figures not given in your letter, and which I had more particularly in mind when I sent my telegram. The Treasury collected last month from customs and internal revenue $40,000,000, of which $14,000,000 was from the last-named source. Crude as is our present system, it affords some means for relief, in that it authorizes the Secretary to deposit in the banks the internal-revenue collections.

You say in your letter:

"It would be well to bear in mind that our receipts and expenditures almost balance from day to day."

Nevertheless, the surplus for September was, as you know, $8,000,000, not an extraordinary sum but fairly large when compared with the item of $1,000,000 anticipated interest, referred to in your letter. If the $24,000,000 internal-revenue collections had been deposited as collected it would have been of benefit in every line of business and industry. Were my suggestions adopted there would be not only the benefit just mentioned, but it would do much to set at rest the visionary financial schemes now prevalent.

Every day's delay in affording relief means, in my opinion, a month's delay in the progress of the prosperity of the people.

I thereupon sent the following letter to the Secretary:

20 BROAD STREET, NEW YORK.

November 4, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I am moved by a sense of duty, and by that alone, to repeat my suggestion of some weeks ago that you use the authority vested in you by law to relieve the continuing stringency in the money market by depositing in the national banks the internal-revenue collections. Whether the condition may have seemed to you when I sent my telegram in the latter part of September, it must now be evident to everybody that the scarcity of money is due to something more than professional manipulation.

The wonderful activity in trade, in all branches, in all parts of the country, is the principal moving cause toward tight money. That the Government, by its steady absorption of the ready capital of the country through the collections of taxes under the war-revenue law, should be the only factor in the way of the people's prosperity is well-nigh inconceivable. The larger national banks—the banks with enormous deposits of twenty-five millions and over—have a selfish interest in maintaining a close money market, as everyone knows. The freeing of the revenue collections by depositing them in the banks would be a boon to merchant, mechanic, and farmer alike, of which I hope you will not longer deprive them.

I am, sir, with great respect, yours, faithfully,

JEFFERSON M. LEVY.

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE,

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

To which he replied as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Washington, D. C., November 6, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 4th instant, suggesting an increase of public deposits in national banks in New York City, your attention is called to the fact that public deposits in national banks throughout the country now aggregate $81,650,000, of which amount about 34 per cent is on deposit with the New York banks. It does not appear at this time that there is any great necessity for increasing deposits in national banks, and to do so in the case of New York banks would likely invite criticism of unfair discrimination against other sections of the country desiring also to be recipients of such deposits.

In this connection it may not be amiss to call your attention further to the fact that the Treasury now holds barely $2,000,000 more than it did a year ago. The available cash balance November 4, 1898, was $302,000,000, and deposits in national banks were $94,773,000, leaving within the Treasury $207,227,000. November 4, 1899, the available cash balance was $291,632,000, and deposits in national banks on that day aggregated $81,650,000, leaving in the Treasury $209,982,000. Last year at this time the market was comparatively easy, and yet the Treasury had within $2,000,000 of the amount it holds now. Whatever stringency there is in the market at this season of the year must, therefore, be attributed to some other reason than the absorption of the money of the country by the Treasury.

Very truly, yours,

LYMAN J. GAGE,

Secretary.

HON. JEFFERSON M. LEVY, New York City.

To which I replied:

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE, Secretary of the Treasury.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of November 6, replying to mine of November 4, in which I suggested that you use the authority vested in you to relieve the continuing stringency in the money market by depositing the internal-revenue collections in the national banks. My suggestion was not that such deposits be made in the national banks of New York City as I am quoted in your letter. There was no such limitation in my suggestion, which was apparently misunderstood by you in that particular. The statement, however, in your letter that "public deposits in national banks throughout the country now aggregate $81,650,000, of which amount about 34 per cent is on deposit in the New York banks," has directed my attention to the fact that the banks of that city have not now on deposit an amount of the public funds at all in proportion to the amount of the volume of monetary transactions made through them, or to the amount of collections by the Internal Revenue Department, to say nothing of customs receipts made in that city; so there would seem to be no reasonable ground for the apprehension expressed in your letter that "to increase the deposits of public funds in the banks of that city would likely invite criticism of unfair discrimination against other sections of the country desiring also to be the recipients of such deposits."

I fail to comprehend the relevancy of such criticism—even if the facts were such as to give rise to them—to the question of the use of the internal-revenue funds for the benefit of the people of the whole country, if the deposits of those funds in the banks located in any one section would best accomplish the purpose in view.

The clearings of the banks in New York City for the month of October, 1899, amounted to about $3,250,000,000, or about 62 per cent of the clearings of the whole country, which amounted in that month to about $5,250,000,000.

You ask my attention in your letter to the fact that the available cash balance in the Treasury a year ago, after deducting $94,773,000 on deposit in the national banks, was only about $2,000,000 less than it is at present after deducting $81,650,000 now deposited in those banks; and you suggest that as the market was comparatively easy a year ago, "the present stringency must be attributed to some other reason than the absorption of the money of the country by the Treasury."

There can be no doubt that the present stringency is to a large extent owing to the increase and expansion of the business of the country, and that condition has produced a requirement of a larger amount of money for the purposes of the business of the country than was required a year ago. There are, however, some other causes for the scarcity of the circulating medium, arising more directly from the operations of the Treasury itself. Many millions of dollars have been drawn from the people to meet the extraordinary war taxes, and have thus found their way into the Treasury.

The issue of $300,000,000 of bonds to meet the expenses incident to the war with Spain transferred from the pockets of the people to the National Treasury that large sum of money, which was found to be in excess of the amount required to be disbursed for the purposes of the war, a result which would have been avoided if the money had been obtained by the issue of interest-bearing certificates of indebtedness as the money was required, instead of the issue of bonds for the gross amount in the first instance.

The amount now collected from the people for taxes, exclusive of customs duties, exceeds $1,000,000 per diem and is continually increasing. It was about $34,000,000 in the month of October.

The volume of business this year, as compared with previous years, is reflected in the increase of bank clearings, which were nearly $23,000,000,000 more than last year in the country at large for the ten months ending with October, and of that excess nearly four-fifths was in the banks of the city of New York.

The prosperity evidenced by this exhibit is threatened by a scarcity of the circulating medium required for the business operations of the country—a condition which did not exist this time last year. Even if the absorption of the money of the country in the Treasury may not have had much potency in producing this condition, a large amount of the money so absorbed is in the Treasury, where it is not required. Why should it not be placed where it can be of service to the business men of the country, for whose purposes it is required? To say that it was not required last year at this time does not change the fact that it is required now. To say that the Treasury has not produced the requirement affords no reason why it should not supply the need.

The deposit in the national banks of the country of a sum equal to that now on deposit in those banks, distributed according to the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, would, in my opinion, accomplish the desired end, and it seems to me that it is but just in morals, as it would be also wise in finance, that the people of the country, whose money has found its way into the Treasury by the sovereign power of taxation, should have the relief which would be afforded to them in the daily operations of their business, by depositing with the national banks as a medium of circulation the money received from internal-revenue taxes, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose in view and as may not be required for the purposes of the Government itself.

Yours respectfully,

JEFFERSON M. LEVY.

NEW YORK, November 12, 1899.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, while I can not agree with the majority of my party associates on the pending bill, I do not intend to apologize for my position. I leave to the gentlemen on the other side of the House the full enjoyment of their recently created monopoly of that commodity. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I will vote for the bill, but not under the pressure of party caucus action. I have a better reason, or "apology," if you prefer that expression, for my action.

It is beyond question that for many years this country has been upon a gold standard. The enactment of the present law merely gives the authority of law to the practice adopted and for many years followed by the Treasury officials. The people of the great commercial and financial center of this country, the city of New York, believe that it is necessary to enact some such law in order to permanently define the financial policy and standard of value of this country. They are entitled to have their opinion voiced in this House, and I merely perform my duty when I reflect their will by my vote. So far as this discussion has proceeded, however, gentlemen on the other side support this measure for the reasons best known to themselves and not disclosed either here or in their wordy effusions in the RECORD.

I have paid close attention to this debate in the vain hope that I would hear some intelligent discussion of the provisions in this bill, to which I am unable to give my approval. Even if I did believe in all of this bill, as you pretend to do, it would not be necessary for me, before I voted for it, as it will be for the most of you, to devour stacks upon stacks of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, filled with my freely expressed and honest opinion in direct opposition to my present position. Beware, my friends; be careful of your utterances, lest the time be short when you will be compelled to repeat your present gastronomical performances. The very apparent necessity that exists for gentlemen on the other side to even partially digest the unwelcome meal that is rudely forced down their throats is the only explanation I can find for the action of the Committee on Rules setting aside even a week for the discussion of this important measure.

With the limited knowledge that I possess upon the question of finance, Mr. Chairman—and in this respect I do not differ radically with many of my friends on the other side—I do not propose to minutely discuss the provisions of this bill. Discussion, indeed, is useless, since you prevent an honest effort at amendment. I can not, however, let the impression go abroad that I am in favor of the proposition to delegate or surrender to any class of individuals or corporations the governmental function of issuing and controlling absolutely the currency of this country. You on the other side have the power to perfect this bill, but apparently you have neither the wisdom nor the manhood to do it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I know that no human agency can produce anything that is perfect, and I am absolutely certain that no sane man ever even dreamed of seeking for perfection in the Republican party. [Applause on Democratic side.] Responsibility for this bill and its defects will rest upon you. It will avail you nothing on the inevitable judgment day that some Democrats have voted for the measure.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more to close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. In my humble opinion you are unconsciously doing the greatest possible good to the Democratic party by enacting this measure, because you remove for six years from the realm of politics the question of finance and the standard of value. While I weep with them that weep on that side for the defects in this measure, I rejoice with those on this side that rejoice at its passage for the welfare of my party. To the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], who so eloquently pictured the other day the general uprising that trailed in the wake of his party's advent into power, I wish to call attention to the fact that he evidently overlooked the uprising in the State of New York.

One short year of Republican Administration convinced the people of that State that it was necessary for them to contribute their mite to the growing prosperity of their country, and they did it by increasing their Democratic representation in this House from 6 to 18 members. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] That is a result that you tell little and care to hear less about.

Mr. Chairman, I firmly believe that this bill, with all its defects, once a law, will prove a leaven to raise to the Presidency of the United States, irrespective of his creed or previous condition politically, the true servant of the people, the nominee of the next national Democratic convention. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I should not think it worth the while of the committee to occupy the floor in response to what was said by my distinguished friend from Ohio, because he has read nothing from my speech of two years ago that contradicted anything that I said on yesterday. I said then, and I repeat it now, that high taxes can not make a prosperous people, and I endeavored, as best my time would allow on yesterday, to point out the natural causes that have produced whatever prosperity that may now exist.

It was not for the purpose of calling his attention to this fact that I took the floor, but for the other purpose of calling the attention of my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to what I must, until he convinces me otherwise, assume was a serious misunderstanding on his part of what I said on yesterday. I find in the RECORD of this morning that he begins his speech in this fashion:

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take any part in this debate until within the last five minutes, but when I heard my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] in his despairing tones admit among the secrets of the Democratic party that it had been gravely considered whether under present conditions that great party had not better disband and go out of the calamity business, I thought,

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, I did not utter one syllable that could have been distorted into an admission that I believe that now, or ever in the future, the Democratic party ought to disorganize. The assertion that I made in proclaiming its immortality was that it had lived through a season of depression when men of less courage than we now possess had advised its disorganization. I distinctly said that this was many years ago, and I added that if you hoped that present conditions would annihilate the Democratic party, you were deceiving yourselves. I told you then that you need not lay that flattering unction to your souls, and I have asked the Official Reporters to furnish to the gentleman from New York a copy of what I did say, and I rely upon his sense of decency and fairness to make the proper correction upon the floor and in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

Mr. ADAMS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields for a moment. Mr. Chairman, what I said yesterday was said after the gentleman from Texas had concluded his speech, and in reference to what I understood in his speech—

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I will do the gentleman the justice to say that I am satisfied it was a mistake on his part, because I am satisfied nobody would have made such a statement if he had not misunderstood me.

Mr. PAYNE. When the gentleman prints his speech, it will show to the House and to him and to everybody else whether the remarks I made were justified or not.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I have asked the Official Reporters to furnish a copy of my remarks to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course I would not do the gentleman from Texas an injustice. If the remarks were not made in that vein, and if the sarcastic reply which I made was not suitable to what the gentleman said, of course my words fall to the ground. If the publication of his speech justifies my remarks, of course they will stand for what they are worth.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I have only to say that I have asked the Official Reporters to furnish the gentleman with the report of what I said, confident in the belief that the gentleman will then see the justice of making the correction. If not, of course we can then make such further comments as shall seem desirable.

Mr. PAYNE. I have not seen the stenographic report.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] moves to strike out the last three words, and is recognized on that motion.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express the satisfaction and pleasure I feel in having an opportunity to vote for this bill. Representing, as I do, a great commercial, manufacturing, and trade district of Pennsylvania, I know that I represent the views of my district in so casting my vote. I feel, also, that as a member of the great Republican party I am fulfilling the pledges that it gave to the people of our country in the Presidential platform of 1896 to establish the gold standard. And I regard it, too, as an evidence of the sincerity of our party that at the first opportunity under present conditions, the two Houses of Congress and the Executive being in unison, we fulfill our pledge.

The gentleman who preceded me said that he had not heard a single Representative on this side of the Chamber give the reasons for his personal convictions of the benefit of the gold standard, but that we had simply been whipped into line by the caucus and made to vote for this bill under the lash. I take up his challenge, and I will answer, at least for one member, as to the reasons for his personal conviction of the benefit of the gold-metallic standard.

In early life it was my privilege to travel somewhat extensively in Europe. Everywhere I went I found that so long as I had in my pocket the English gold sovereign I could exchange it in any country for par and very often at a premium, whereas did I carry the coin of any other country the moment I crossed the boundary into another nation I was compelled to suffer often a heavy discount to change it into the money of the country where I happened to be. Later in life, while residing and traveling in South America, I found the English sovereign of equal potency; even in countries where the measure of value rested on a silver basis I found the desire to exchange their currency for the English sovereign was quite as ravenous as that of the countries of Europe, even those which pretended to be on a silver basis. This led me to inquire into the system of English finance, their standard of value, and the banking system, and I became convinced that a currency founded on a single metal, and that metal gold, was the best that could be devised for domestic and foreign exchanges. From that time to this I have never wavered in my conviction, and long before I had the honor to sit in this body and ever since I have believed in a monometallic gold standard.

There is another reason under present conditions in our country that reinforces this conviction. Under the protective system of our country, coupled with our reciprocity treaties with foreign nations, and having acquired additional territory through the Spanish war, we are about to enter upon an expansion of our trade and commerce unprecedented in the history of our country. It is an undeniable fact that whatever may be the basic foundation of the currency of any given country the exchanges of the world are made on a gold basis. For this reason it strongly appears that it is essential upon entering upon a competition for the world's trade that our merchants and manufacturers should start out with our currency founded on the basis of the world's exchange. Cargoes purchased with gold and shipped to this country may fear no depreciation in the value of the contents exported, but that they will bring at least an equal price or an enhanced price if paid for in a depreciated currency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMS. I would like five minutes more. I have had no time at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I come now to the features of this bill which relate to our banking laws. They are not satisfactory to me, but all legislation must be based upon a compromise, and as a good Republican I am entirely willing to moderate, in part, my individual views to the sense or opinion of our great party. In my judgment the great difficulty in the financial system of our country is that our Government plays the part of a bank of issue, but not of a bank of discount. It is therefore hampered with all of the disadvantages of issuing currency without any control over it after it is so issued through the power of regulating it through loans or discount. So also with restraining the outflow of gold from our country. The Government has no power, like the Bank of England, in raising the discount to retard its outflow. The provision in this bill which requires that the greenbacks once redeemed by gold can only be paid out again in exchange for gold, to my mind, is the strongest provision in the bill. The panic of 1893 was mainly caused by what is known as the endless chain, which enabled bankers and exporters of gold to drain the Treasury of this reserve fund for the security of the greenbacks to such an extent as to impair the Government's credit. This provision of itself is enough to warrant the adherence of any sound-money man in his support of this measure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Another feature of this bill which seems a step in the right direction is the allowance of the national banks to issue circulation up to the par value of the Government bonds deposited for its security. But even this, in my judgment, does not provide sufficiently for the elasticity of the currency. As prosperity comes to the country, more money is needed for the transaction of daily business. With the same prosperity comes an increase of the purchasing power, and more goods are imported from abroad. This increases the revenue of the Government, and to-day the circulating medium of our country is being locked up in the Treasury because the revenues exceed the expenditures of the Government, and there is no way to restore the circulating medium to the channels of trade except by the Government anticipating the interest on its bonds or by the purchase of the bonds themselves. This latter course is objectionable, because the more bonds are purchased by the Government the higher they raise the market price.

Mr. Chairman, I have sat here for six years and listened to able debates on these intricate problems of currency and banking. I have studied the question and taken special courses at my university, and the conclusion I have come to is that the same rules that apply to an individual apply to a government. The man that pays as he goes and has the fewer obligations and promissory notes to meet is the man that is in the soundest financial condition. For this reason I consider that the outstanding greenbacks and Treasury notes of the United States should be retired at the earliest date possible, with a provision for the substitution of bank currency to take their place. I believe that bankers and men in business understand their own affairs best, the same as members of the medical and legal professions, whose advice we seek when we have need of their special services. Bankers are as necessary to civilization as are doctors, lawyers, and scientists.

The prejudice of the uneducated people of our country against bankers, in my judgment, is unfounded; even if, as they claim, they wish to rob the mass of the people, they at least wish to rob them of good money and not bad. It would certainly be more to their interest. The plan submitted by the Indianapolis convention appeals to my judgment as a good one, and I believe that the measure which we are now passing is a stepping-stone that will lead to the establishment of a currency for our country founded on a solid basis and not on a promise to pay or on the credit of the United States Government. For this reason I believe that the greenbacks of the country should be retired. If in the future our country should be involved in a war or in financial troubles, and, as was the case during the war of the rebellion, our bonds could only be sold at a high rate of interest as well as a heavy discount, and, as then, in the event that it should be necessary to issue paper money founded on the credit of the Government Treasury, we would be in a better position, with no such obligations outstanding, than to start out with liabilities of the same nature already outstanding.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that my views represent the thoughts, somewhat in advance, of the average sentiment of our country, but I believe them to be founded on sound reasoning and the experience of other nations. I am an American, heart, soul, and body, proud of my country and its rapid development and growth, but I am not so carried away by my feelings but that I think our Republic, young in years as compared with other nations, can learn from their methods, founded on long and well-tried experience. I congratulate our country on the near realization of the adoption of the gold standard, and sincerely hope it is but the entering wedge to further unification in the system of the finances of our country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I find myself in the House to-day suffering and against the orders of my physician, but I could not leave this Chamber without the expression of my belief that this measure is the culmination of a hundred years of studied villainy and wrong. It is more dangerous than grasping imperialism, more outrageous than domineering militarism. It will destroy the constitutional rights and privileges of the people and bring direct woe, desolation, and ruin upon the agricultural and laboring classes, and deliver the great body of the people, bound hand and foot, over to the money power. [Applause.]

With its passage the national banks will be the Government, and the administration of government in all its policies will be at the dictation of the national banks. Through its operations there will be formed the mightiest trust that has ever existed since the world began. God pity the people when it shall become a law. Line upon line, paragraph upon paragraph, section upon section, in part and in its entirety it is the embodiment of the most hideous wrong and grossest injustice. So far-reaching is its effects that it is impossible for the mind to at once grasp the extent of its power!

It is not a measure that has been wrought out or thought out by the genius of our friends on the other side since 1890, but it is the culminating result of years of conference had with men across the seas, and conferences with men whose interests are not the interests of the American people. [Applause from the Democratic side and cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" from the Republicans.] Looking across the aisle into the eyes of my old friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] I have the confidence to believe that this is not a combination of the people of the United States, but it is a combination in favor of an alliance between the moneyed interests of the United States and Great Britain.

As in 1873 it was British influence that demonetized silver and substituted the gold dollar as the unit of value, so in this hour the same influence is upon this floor and as surely dictates the policy of this bill as the God of nature dictates the rising and the setting of the sun. [Applause.]

You have no policy of finance; you dare not have a policy of finance except one handed you ready-made by the same hand and influence that directs the financial policy of Great Britain. Never was there a Congress convened since the hour of the birth of our nation that had any set of members so completely under the control, so absolutely subservient, and so thoroughly willing to obey and to respond to the whip and lash of the stock jobbers as the members of the dominant party in this Fifty-sixth Congress.

If it were not so serious a measure as to threaten the common interests of our country, it would be amusing to listen to the great lights of the Republican party upon this floor, to hear them talk of changed conditions, and to utter their specious apologies for their past records; but knowing this bill, fraught with so much woe to the people, must become a law, it makes one heartsick to witness the flippancy and jocularly with which men intrusted with the happiness, the hopes, and the safety of the homes of millions of our people can place this great iniquity upon our statute books. The chameleon in the tropics is a harmless and interesting work of God's creation, but the human chameleon on the floor of Congress becomes as dangerous as a pestilence and as horrible to contemplate as a famine.

When the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] can base his reasons for his change of front and abandon his defense of the common people upon no more solid argument than the construction of a foundation for his cow barn, and my venerable colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the mouthpiece of the Administration, has no more valid reason for committing this outrage upon the people than the argument that conditions have changed since he stood upon the floor of the house of representatives of the State of Ohio shouting that common honesty, common decency, and the letter and spirit of the contract under which the great body of our indebtedness was assumed demanded the immediate restoration of silver money to its lawful place as primary money of our country, what can one expect of the Republicans here? What conditions have changed since then? Is it right now to assassinate the letter and spirit of the contract?

Has a condition of affairs come about where the vilest crimes have become resplendent virtues? Have we no longer need for respect of law and regard for the Constitution? Are we no longer to believe the sacred promises made to the people, or must we learn that from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same there is no one hour in which they can trust the continuance of the plighted faith of those who make laws for this nation? But, Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at the action of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], for he can make his changes upon the political stage as rapidly, as easily, and with equal brazenness as any soubrette that ever graced the boards of the Bijou or Kernan's. [Laughter.]

Age but adds agility to his political joints, and whether going up or coming down the ladder on any proposition he always faces the public with the statement that "conditions have changed," and that he is thus justified in his acrobatic performances, dressed or undressed, before the American people. Like Noah's ark, he is built without a rudder or steering machinery, and he sails backward as readily as forward, and cares not in what direction he goes, so long as he lands on the winning side or the Ararat of notoriety.

Adopted by the Republican party, the very opening section of this bill, which reads—

That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle—is a repudiation of the pronouncement of that party at its last national convention, where it most solemnly made the declaration that it was in favor of bimetalism, a declaration which alone saved the party from ignominious defeat.

The advocacy of this bill by the party in power is a stultification of its record as a party, but not of its policy, and it is the confusion of its leaders from the Executive down.

It was introduced in this House by a gentleman from a State in which the Republicans, at the beginning of the open struggle for the accomplishment of this vile purpose, declared by a plank in their State platform:

The public debt should be honestly paid; and all the bonds issued therefor should be paid for in legal tenders, commonly called greenbacks, except where by their express terms they provide otherwise.

Then we have the words of the eloquent Senator from Ohio, the recognized champion, at the time, of Republicanism, Mr. FORAKER, who in 1896 said:

I sincerely hope some safe way may be found for the restoration of silver to its rightful place alongside of gold as a money of ultimate redemption. I shall favor every measure calculated in my judgment to bring about that result.

Again, we have the language of the standard bearer of the Republican party, the present Executive, William McKinley, President of the United States, who as late as when writing his letter of acceptance of his nomination as President outlined the pretended purpose of the policies of the Republican party. He then wrote:

It is not proposed by the Republican party to take from the circulating medium of the country any of the silver we now have. On the contrary, it is proposed to keep all the silver money now in circulation on a parity with gold by maintaining the pledge of the Government that all of it shall be equal to gold. This has been the unbroken policy of the Republican party since 1878. It has inaugurated no new policy. It will keep in circulation and as good as gold all of the silver and paper money which are now included in the currency of the country.

Thus stands the record. How striking, how marvelous the change, since by the deception of confiding voters who, believing this to be the real purpose of the Republican party, gave it their votes in 1896 and continued it in power. The proof is voluminous. It could be extended for days, showing how that party made express declarations and promises against any such change as is proposed in this bill.

Yet, now, with indecent haste you seek to take from the money in circulation silver and paper; by a single paragraph in this bill you would take from the people $346,000,000 in legal-tender currency, commonly known as greenbacks. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, why this change of front on the part of our misguided confrères on the Republican side? There is no great question of national safety demanding the passage of this bill. We are not confronted by any crisis that calls for such heroic treatment. There is no such surfeit of gold hoarded in our Treasury as to imperil the destiny of our Government if no action be taken at the crack of the whip. Still, the Republicans here, with eager haste, seek to force immediate action.

Instead of allowing the usual and customary form of legislation to be followed, this bill, the first to be introduced in this Congress, is not referred to any committee for consideration and report, but even before committees are announced the bill is brought before this body for immediate action, the gag rule is applied, and under the lash of the party whip the bill will pass, in order that the Administration may obey the order of the money power, in whose hands and under whose control it placed itself in 1896. [Applause.] And the action is to be permitted through the fear, under the threat, that if it is not done, in the coming Presidential campaign the Republican party will lose the millions of campaign funds already promised and so sink into defeat and ruin.

It was with prophetic inspiration that the immortal Lincoln said:

The money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all the wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic destroyed.

These words are too true, and I do not wonder that the Republicans of to-day seek to discredit and impeach their authenticity, although they do so in vain. This bill, by which our Government is to be formally committed to the single gold standard, is only an effort made by the aggregated money power of to-day to concentrate all the wealth in their hands.

Mr. Chairman, if the claim be true that is made upon this floor by the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. OVERSTREET], by the leader of the House on the opposite side of the Chamber [Mr. PAYNE], and concurred in by the entire Republican side, that we have had the single gold standard in operation in this country since 1834, strengthened in 1853, and made absolutely certain in 1873, then what is the necessity for the introduction of this bill or the consummation of a purpose already established?

I agree with you that certainly since 1873 you have had in operation, to all intents and purposes, by custom and law, the single gold standard; but you must not expect to deceive the people or hope to make them believe that the establishment of the single gold standard is the true and sole purpose of this bill. There is more behind it and deeper devilment embodied in its provisions than simply a gold standard. Its purposes are to build up within our borders a power greater than that ever conferred upon any king, emperor, or ruler in any land. The combined strength and influences of the banks, syndicates, monopolies, and trusts are at the back of the bill, demanding that into their rapacious maw shall be turned the savings of this nation and the hopes of generations yet unborn, and this Republican majority leaps with eager haste to do their bidding. [Applause.]

For years legalized robbery has been permitted in the land and a few score names have been added to the roll of the millionaires, while millions of the toiling masses have been made homeless thereby; and now, when, in the light of recent elections and by the growing determination on the part of the people to free themselves, there seemed to be a rift in the clouds of despair, when the prospect of a Democratic victory is bright ahead, a victory for and of the people, the Republicans in this Congress seek to fasten more firmly the galling shackles of financial slavery upon a long-suffering people. [Applause.]

And this they do upon the specious plea of "honest money." Honest money forsooth! There never was a dishonest dollar issued by the Government of the United States until the Republican party came into control. No one ever made a dishonest dollar except the Republican party and counterfeiters. The counterfeiter acts in open violation of law; the Republicans by fraud, deceit, and dishonesty place upon our statute books laws making certain money dishonest or depreciated; and they are at their old tricks now, seeking again to put appreciated gold into the coffers of the bankers.

Go back with me a little in our nation's history, when the great storm of the rebellion swept over our land, when on Southern battlefields brothers fought against brothers, when brave men faced the deadly hail of shot and shell that our Union might live and that we might have a Government upon the face of the earth. Then, when the eyes of the nation were upon the boys at the front, when the prayers of the nation were for the successful issue of battle, the greed and avarice of the money power here at the nation's capital urged through Congress laws which gave them millions and the soldiers a pittance.

The soldier who gave his life upon the altar of his country received greenbacks, while they who gave only of their ill-gotten self demanded and received appreciated gold. Now, when we have another war, when our brave boys are showing the glory of American manhood and performing their duty as soldiers in the far Philippines—in a war begun, fostered, and maintained, not for freedom or for the glory of the United States, but a war of conquest and aggression instituted for the aggrandizement of combined syndicates, monopolies, and trusts—at this time there is a repetition of the tactics pursued by the vampires of the civil war, and the greenback, the greenback which saved the Union, is to be forever wiped away, and in its place they propose to permit the banks to issue their notes, and also, by this bill, double the value of the gold holdings of the trusts.

To issue money is a high Government prerogative and function, and it should remain so. It should never be handed over to any class. Banks should never be allowed or permitted to issue paper money for the people. To allow them to do so places the power of the inflation and contraction of the currency at all times in their hands and enables them to stand as blackmailers and highwaymen, endangering the well-being of the nation. [Applause.]

It will bring about distrust and fear, a loss of confidence; wild-cat money will again be afloat and panics prevail. National banks sometimes fail. Already, since the discussion of this bill has commenced, Boston starts in with failures of gigantic proportion, and, mark my words, before another six months shall roll around the effect of this bill will be seen in failure after failure westward across the continent.

In the discussion of this bill the Republican leaders admit their changed position. They are forced to admit it, and yet they do not offer any consistent defense for their change; they hide behind their unanimous party caucus action, their fealty and allegiance to a shifting Administration, not their allegiance to the Government, not their patriotic adhesion to country and the best interests of the people, but sheltered under the protecting folds of Shylock's robes, they say they have changed, and taunt us because we do not change with them.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party does remain true to its traditions and its policies. It stands to-day for a great principle, that of the right of the people to govern and to have the government administered in their interest. In its adhesion to the rights of the people it does not change. Conditions do change, the budding leaves and flowers of spring are followed by the ripened grain and fruit of autumn, these in turn by the winter's snow and sleet; the tides ebb and flow; the moon revolves around our earth, presenting continually changing phases, and yet, there is a great law which governs the seasons, that prescribes the undeviating accuracy of the planets in their orbits, which is absolutely unchanging, for it is based upon the eternal law of the Mighty Creator, the law of God, and, sir, the principles of the Democratic party are based and founded upon the eternal law of Truth and Right, which does not change. [Applause.]

This measure is wholly unnecessary and alien to our best good. The admission of the champion of the bill that "every dollar of our money in circulation is absolutely sound and unquestioned" is sufficient to condemn the bill. To by one fell stroke contract our money one-half, to destroy one-half of the volume of our money, which now is "sound and unquestioned," is not the act of anyone who loves his country. Intrinsic value in money is a fallacy long since exploded. In the relations of business all settlements are effected by a common standard of value, and that standard is the one recognized and authorized by law.

The people have had full and complete confidence in our money. Gold and silver and paper have passed from hand to hand, business transactions of magnitude unparalleled in the history of the world have been carried on, and no serious embarrassment was felt, but when the syndicate of shylocks began their ghoulish campaign against the people and sought to bring about a change of standards, when they sought to fasten upon the people and commit the Government to the maintenance of a single gold standard, then it was that confidence was shaken, our credit imperiled, and panic and ruin followed.

When in 1873 the change was effected, "so simple and unattended by the slightest disturbance," as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] observes, it was accomplished by means of such a monstrous crime that when discovered the nation stood aghast and the foundations of our financial honor and stability trembled. [Applause.]

The act of 1873, which, according to the champions of the present act, made gold the legal standard of our country, was a strange act. Why was not the issue made openly, so clear and plain that every member of Congress, every citizen of our land wherever a newspaper might be found, everyone, would know the truth, meaning, and extent of the bill?

But, no! Search the files of the newspapers of that year and you will not find a word anywhere to show that it was known that the standard had been changed and silver demonetized. The bill was prepared in Great Britain, brought here, and pushed through by stealth. Those voting for it have openly declared that it was not until years afterwards that they knew what they had done.

In 1873, twenty-four days after the passage of the codified mint law in England and the surreptitious repeal of the silver law, there was introduced into the Congress of the United States a codified mint law, in which the silver dollar was dropped from the list of coins given free coinage, and this omission was kept from the members of Congress, from the President who signed the revised mint law, and from the American people.

Three years after this surreptitious legislation was passed Senator Roscoe Conkling, on the floor of the Senate, said:

Will the Senator [Mr. Bogy] allow me to ask him or some other Senator a question? Is it true that there is now by law no American dollar?—Congressional Record, March 30, 1876.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fourth Congress):

It was not discussed, as shown by the record, and neither members of Congress nor the people understood the scope of the legislation.

Also Senator Beck, of Kentucky (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress):

It was never understood by either House of Congress.

Mr. Burchard, of Illinois (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 13, 1876):

Unaccompanied by written report, * * * unknown to members of Congress, who without opposition, allowed it to pass.

Judge Kelley, of Pennsylvania (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress):

I was ignorant of the fact that it would demonetize the silver dollar. * * *

Mr. Blaine (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 15, 1878):

I did not know anything that was in the bill at all.

The parents were afraid to own their child or ashamed to acknowledge the frightful monstrosity.

We are indeed a great nation, but of late we seem to have developed many of the characteristics of a big, blustering bully, so much has the domination of the money power lowered our moral standard and sense of honor. We are great in material resources. Tap the artery of a giant and draw his lifeblood from him—how quickly he becomes enfeebled and at the mercy of his foes!

Money is the lifeblood of our nation, and if its circulation be contracted, if the volume of our currency be lessened, then our strength as a nation becomes lessened. The giant may be kept up by stimulants to a fictitious strength, and the nation, by the effect of bond issues, may for a time show seeming vitality; but when normal conditions are resumed then the nation will sink into premature decay. This bill will absolutely draw from the lifeblood of the nation, shut out of circulation all the greenbacks, all the Treasury notes, all the silver coin, dishonoring the dollar of our fathers, and by this much depleting the volume of currency at the disposal of our Government. It is brought through no demand from the people. No cry has come up from the tolling masses of our land asking that this bill do pass. No! True to their past record, the Republican party ignores the people and listens only to the order of the money kings. [Applause.]

Every obligation of our Government to-day may be paid in silver, silver money whose soundness and honesty is beyond question. You would make every bond, every Treasury note, every greenback, every silver dollar, to be paid in gold. The contract calls for "coin," silver or gold, but you read it only "gold." You charge us with opposition only. I deny it. We do oppose robbery and dishonor, but we champion honesty, justice, and decency. It is as great a crime to alter the terms of a contract in favor of the holder of bonds as it would be to alter the contract in favor of the people who are to pay the bonds. Suppose you were to introduce a bill to the effect that every bond should be paid in the same kind of money with which it was purchased. Would such a measure be unjust? But we do not propose even that. We only claim that the bonds should be paid according to the terms of the contract, according to law, and that the money of the Constitution be not impaired, vitiated, or destroyed. [Applause.]

We have a large amount of gold and silver. In the last two years the increase in the supply of gold has been unprecedented, but under our laws that gold is subject virtually to free coinage and does not become the property of the Government by the simple act of its production. You give the holder of gold a privilege at the mint that you deny to the holder of silver. There is no limit placed upon the amount of gold that may be coined for private individuals save the natural limit of production and the capacity of the mints. Often in our history the annual production of gold has been in excess of that of silver, and the argument of the advocates of the gold standard that the Government could not afford to permit the coinage of silver dollars for private individuals without limit applies with equal strength and justice to gold.

There never has been in all our history, in all the history of the world, a time when there was too much legal-tender money in circulation. There never will be. No one can draw aside the curtain of the future and reveal what a day will bring forth, but we may judge the future from the past, and it is a fair and reasonable proposition that our needs and demands will keep apace if not ahead of our opportunities to supply them. So if every ounce of silver and every ounce of gold that was mined should be coined into money and placed in circulation, there would not be a single dollar more than the needs of our people would require, but to strike from our resources one-half of our money must cripple, crush, and destroy.

You say you are prepared now to make this change, that there is a vast amount of gold accumulated in the Treasury. In the Treasury statement to-day we have in gold coin and bullion a little over $242,000,000. What would you do if you were immediately faced with the proposition to redeem $346,000,000 of greenbacks now outstanding. Issue bonds. Ah, there is the secret! Greenbacks do not draw interest and are the people's money; the bonds draw interest, payable in gold, and are in the hands of the few.

Yes, you will be forced to the "endless chain" of bond issuing to meet the expenses of the Government and also to pay the annual interest charges of $400,000,000 due and payable in Europe on our bonds and securities. You can not get enough gold in any other way. Even now, with all our forms of money, we are confronted with a big deficiency at the end of the fiscal year. The customs receipts upon imports under the Dingley law for last year were only $206,128,481.75, and as you dare not support an income tax your bond issues and war taxes must keep on.

There are many ways in which a drain would come upon your accumulation of gold, so many that your vast hoard would melt away like snow before the summer's sun. Take the vast aggregation of corporate capital in the State of trusts, New Jersey, where over $2,000,000,000 of trust securities have been, within a short time, combined in chartered organizations. These huge combines with their bonds and stocks must have their interest and dividends (payable in gold), for I can assure you the people who are in these trusts are not in them for fun or pleasure; they are in for business and profit alone, and in order to secure this gold will be needed.

Another feature connected with the operation of these trusts may well be mentioned here. In order to have dividends there must be profits, and for profit there must needs be both advanced price upon the output and decreased expenses in operation, resulting in reduction of wages and lower prices for raw material. This in a measure is already taking place, and the leaders in trust circles do not hesitate to state their determination to go still further in this direction, that it is their purpose and intention to proceed upon this line in every avenue open to them. This by the natural law of trade will then diminish our exports, and soon the balance of trade will be against us, driving more gold from our shores. Even now the stream is turning that way. [Applause.]

Another factor which every year draws a large amount of gold out of the country is the tide of foreign travel to European shores. In ordinary years the amount is vast, but in the coming year the Paris Exposition will be a lodestone to draw and attract a great mass of people, and intelligent, experienced, cautious, and conservative persons estimate that from this one item of foreign travel alone the startling sum of $250,000,000 will be drained from our land. With this enormous reduction from our resources the financial circles of our nation will have a dangerous condition confronting them, and the time does not certainly look propitious for the adoption of a gold standard now.

The total coinage of gold for the last fiscal year was $108,177,180, and the diversion from our business of more than double the annual coinage by one item alone can not but be a menace to the success of maintaining the single gold standard. The song of prosperity is chanted in this Chamber, but not in the workshop and on the farm. According to the Athenian orator from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the light of happiness gleams in the home of every workman in the land because of employment at high wages; the miners in his district are crying out to him that there is too much prosperity.

From the delightful speech of the eloquent gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] we gather that the heart of everyone who has aught to sell glows with joy because of advanced prices, higher prices for the necessities of life, and the voice of the employer is heard wailing in the streets because there are no idle men to be employed. Verily their songs are siren-like, their panegyrics beautiful, their eloquence sublime; but when we descend from the clouds and in cold, sober realism behold facts, when we enlarge our vision and look over the whole country beyond the limited horizon which shuts in around Farmer DOLLIVER'S barn, we see strange sights which raise a doubt as to the truth of universal or general prosperity. [Laughter.]

In Idaho the underlings of the Administration have erected corals in which to confine, under guard of armed soldiers, people guilty of no crime, but because they are suspected of being in sympathy with striking miners, and the commanding general sets forth in general orders that these miners must work at the wages he names. In Pennsylvania one of the great trusts builds a trocha of wire fencing around one of its mining villages, and the poor miners must submit to its dictation or starve. These are samples of the slavery which this trust prosperity would speedily bring about if its power be not curtailed.

There is an enormous amount of money in the country, but its distribution is glaringly unequal. In the vaults of Wall street, in the coffers of the trusts, there is an abundance, but among the toiling millions there is penury and want. As for labor, all over the land are seen closed factories. Every branch of industry that the octopus grasp of the trusts has gathered in—and where is there one that has not been taken—has had competition destroyed. A factory here and there in each line of manufacture has been selected to continue in operation, while hundreds of others under the trust control are closed and silent as the tomb, the operatives discharged by tens of thousands, their traveling salesmen called in and told that their services are no longer needed, in one instance alone, that of the tobacco trust, 3,000 salesmen, "drummers," losing their position in one day because of trust "prosperity."

Go over the nation, among the farmers of the land. Are they prosperous? It is true that nature has given them abundant harvests, and the necessities of the world, war, pestilence, and famine, have combined to temporarily raise the prices of a few of their products, but have their farms increased in value; have their prices kept equal pace with improvements and the advancing price of bank stock? Is it not true that land can be purchased in almost every farming community in the United States to-day at a price far below the original cost of the same and the improvements made thereon?

Are taxes lower in proportion to the decrease of land values? No; and this bill will not aid the farmer. The only beneficiary of this measure is the trust and the banker, and from them, and them alone, come words of approval of the action of their tools who present this bill. By the operation of this act money will double in value as it will decrease in circulation among the people. It provides for the payment of the entire bonded debt of the nation, some $1,037,049,690, and the annual interest on the same in gold; for the abstraction of Treasury notes, $99,026,280, of $346,081,016 of greenbacks, and of $482,622,376 of silver dollars, all to be redeemed in gold—a total greater than twice all the production of gold in the United States for the past twenty-five years.

Thus will gold money double in value, and the trusts will receive full compensation and return for their vast outlay of money for the retention in power of the Republican party, while the people will be compelled to "still make bricks, but without straw." [Applause.] Every bond, mortgage, note, or indebtedness must also double in value, because they are payable in money, not in labor or products of labor, and therefore this legislation is wholly in the interest of the creditor classes; proposed and introduced solely in subservient obedience to the demands of the grasping trusts of to-day, and especially that of the mightiest trust of all, the banking trust, because that is the breeder of all trusts.

In this trust no small bankers are allowed to enter. It is a national-bank scheme, and they are to be a law unto themselves, forming a mighty combination whereby the small banker will eventually be frozen out; the large banks will follow the example already set in large cities and consolidate in a single institution. This, with its board of directors in one place, would be to center the whole financial interests of our country in the control of a dozen men; then given the power, as this bill contemplates, of issuing or withholding paper currency at their pleasure, the result would be either the conversion of the people of this nation into serfs or bring about an armed revolution.

This last possibility is what they have feared, and for years they have studied to educate the people into a condition of submission, as well as make preparation to defend their position by force. The attempt to create a large standing army was a part of their plan. Having the Army of sufficient size to overawe and put down any concerted revolt, they apply the pressure by means of contraction of money, and very soon the holdings of a whole people will pass into their hands, and instead of being a free and enlightened nation, we will become a nation of slaves, disheartened, discouraged, driven to our daily duties by the lash of the brutal taskmaster.

I know it is useless to speak upon this measure. Reason, argument, facts, are of no avail. No appeal to your manhood, your love of country and of home, will reach you. You are deaf to cries of distress. Your consciences are seared, and you will obey orders and pass the bill, selling yourselves, your countrymen, and your country to gain the support and praise of your masters, the trusts; but I protest against the iniquitous act. In the name of the people whose servant I am, in the name of justice, honor, virtue, truth, and the Constitution upon which our Government is founded and whose teachings you are violating, I call you to witness that upon you and your party must rest the foul blot of this crime against the homes and fortunes of our land. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] withdraws his formal amendment.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Chairman, the pending financial measure consists of several propositions more or less distinct from each other. To some of these no substantial objections can well be interposed.

So long as the present national-bank system remains, it is difficult to discover why the public interests would not be subserved by permitting national banks to be organized with a capital of $25,000 in any place the population of which does not exceed 2,000 inhabitants. This extension of banking facilities to small localities throughout the country seems to be a wise provision and is likely to meet with general approval, especially in the rural districts.

National banks, under existing laws, are permitted to issue their bank notes to an amount equal to 90 per cent of the bonds deposited as security for their circulation, and another proposition is to permit such notes to be issued to an amount equal to the par value of such bonds. This feature would not contract our currency, but would expand it, and as all our Government bonds are much above par, there can be no danger involved in the proposed amendment. There are times when such an increase of the currency would be most desirable, not so much in the interests of banks as in the interest of the people, and when such increase can be accomplished safely it is good policy as well as good politics to permit it to be done. The "dog in the manger" policy is never popular and is sometimes detrimental.

The provision for the retirement of our greenback currency involved in the scheme of not reissuing such currency except for coin received in exchange therefor would materially strengthen the Treasury and relieve it from much of the embarrassment from which it has suffered in the past, especially in periods of financial excitement and peril. The greenback currency has always been an anomaly in finance; it has no intrinsic value; it is fiat money pure and simple; it has proved a menace to the Treasury ever since 1879, and it should no longer be tolerated, at least not without having a coin fund on hand at all times and under all circumstances for its redemption.

I have no time to discuss this phase of the question further, and simply content myself with asserting that this provision of the pending bill is a step in the right direction.

We come now to the main object of the bill.

The ostensible and principal purpose of the measure, as proclaimed by its friends, is the establishment of the gold standard.

In one view of the measure it does that, and in another it does not. It is true it declares in one section that the standard unit of value shall be the gold dollar; but it declares in another section that "nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar."

It is clear that a gold dollar, which is to be the "standard unit of value," should logically and consistently be the money of final redemption, the money with which all other money or currency of the Government should be redeemed.

The bill is inconsistent in its details. It faces both ways.

It ostentatiously proclaims in the second section that all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes, and all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money, shall be paid and performed in conformity with the gold standard established in section 1; and in the next sentence provides that the silver dollar shall still be a legal tender for everything, the same as now, and therefore all the public and private obligations mentioned, as well as United States notes and Treasury notes, may still, under that section, be paid or redeemed in silver dollars, as now.

In plain words, it is the establishment of the gold standard, with a string to it.

If it be urged that section 4 provides that United States notes and Treasury notes shall be redeemed in gold coin at the will of the holder, then it conflicts with section 2, or at least it leaves United States bonds and all other public as well as private obligations payable in silver coin, and it may well be asked what kind of a (single) "standard" dollar is it which tolerates by its side another and a rival dollar possessing substantially equal powers of payment and redemption.

It will also be observed that section 4 does not absolutely, positively, or impliedly provide for the redemption of silver certificates in standard gold dollars, but declares that "all silver certificates presented for redemption shall be redeemed in accordance with existing law," to wit, in silver coin.

The bill, so far as it assumes to establish a gold standard, is a fraud on its face, and is only intended to deceive the people.

There can not logically or consistently be a single gold standard with other forms of money used at the same time for purposes of legal-tender payments and for final redemption.

The creation of a single gold standard by the United States Government must necessarily and inevitably virtually demonetize every other form of money in use by that Government, or else there is no gold standard established in the proper sense of the term.

The promoters of this portion of the measure are seeking to claim credit for doing something which they have not done.

If they have discovered that the gold resources of the Government are not sufficient at this time to warrant the attempt to maintain a complete, perfect, and entire gold standard, then they should frankly acknowledge the fact.

No provision can be found in the bill which absolutely requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay all the obligations or redeem all the other money of the Government in gold coin; and without some such provision the establishment of the gold standard becomes impossible.

The provision which simply authorizes the Secretary, in his discretion, to exchange gold coin for other coin or money of the Government is not enough, and falls far short of establishing a gold standard.

Besides, that provision confers no new authority. He has that power already under existing laws, or at least frequently exercises it without question from any source.

There is another answer to this portion of the pending measure. If the gold standard already exists "as now," as the friends of this bill so stoutly claim, then it is conceded there is no necessity for this measure.

An unnecessary measure is usually a mischievous measure.

But even conceding that the bill is sufficient in form and substance to do what its friends assert in its behalf, it is unwise to enact it.

The establishment of the single gold standard by law is contrary to the established policy of the Government.

No such bill was ever enacted since our nation was created.

While there has not at all times been the free coinage of both metals (owing to various causes unnecessary to here mention), there has never been a single standard adopted by the country since the Government was organized.

Our national policy has been that of bimetalism. We have always favored the double standard. Both political parties have been committed to it. The platform of both the Republican and Democratic parties in 1892 favored the double standard.

The statute of 1893, repealing the Sherman silver law, pledged the country to the policy of bimetalism, and that statute, supported by nearly all Republicans and many Democrats alike, and approved by President Cleveland, was as follows:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to maintain the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetalism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

Moreover, the Republican national committee of 1896 expressly declared in favor of international bimetalism.

But now all disguises are to be thrown off, all past policies are to be repudiated, and a new and untried experiment is to be entered upon.

It may be pertinent to inquire, if this measure becomes a law, what becomes of the provisions of the war-revenue law of 1898 which provide for the coinage of the seigniorage in the Treasury, under which we are now coining a million and a half of silver dollars each and every month, which are declared in the law itself to be "standard" silver dollars?

Is that law to be deemed repealed, or is the spectacle to be witnessed of our Government establishing the gold dollar as the standard dollar and at the same time permitting the coinage of "standard" silver dollars which are to be a legal tender, not only for all existing debts and obligations, but for all those which may hereafter be entered into?

The provisions of the bill are crude, incongruous, and deceptive. Sound-money men, sincere believers in a single gold standard, as well as bimetalists, may all, with propriety and consistency, oppose such an objectionable and unsatisfactory a measure.

If a separate vote could be had on some of the commendable features of the measure, I would cheerfully support them; but as they can not be separated from the objectionable provisions of the bill, I feel constrained to vote against the measure as an entirety so long as it remains in its present shape. [Applause.]

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, having at a previous Congress given my views at length upon the good faith, the fair business faith, of the Government to pay all of its obligations, unless there was a specific mode of payment provided, in such legal tender as the creditor of the Government might require at the time of payment, if there be more than one legal tender, I have not had any desire to take part in the general discussion of this bill.

The broad principle, if it be admitted, that the Government in good faith should thus pay its obligations covers everything in the bill. As the Government makes all legal tenders for the payment of debts, in the exercise of this arbitrary power it is in good faith incumbent on the Government to see that all of its legal tenders for the payment of debts are kept equal, or as nearly so as possible, in commercial value. Hence the creditor has the right to demand any legal tender that he wishes, if there be more than one at the time of payment. Individuals can not make legal tenders; therefore the debtor has the right to pay at his option in any legal tender, if there be more than one.

This bill is based on the plighted faith of the Government given in acts of Congress at different periods. On February 25, 1862, Congress passed a law for the first issue of the greenbacks and for the loan of $500,000,000, known as the 5-20 bonds. In that act, which is the basis of all the indebtedness of the Government to-day unpaid, except a very little, the Government pledged its faith to collect its duties in coin, and the coin so collected to be set apart in a special fund to be used as follows:

First, to pay the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States. Second, to redeem 1 per cent of the indebtedness of the Government annually every fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862. That is the pledge of the Government to pay its debt, principal and interest, in coin; and "coin" meant, when that law was passed, gold. It meant gold in contradistinction to paper. In all of this discussion I have listened to, most gentlemen seem to imply that coin means either gold or silver, and that either could in good faith be paid to discharge the public obligations. The duties provided for here were collected in gold except amounts less than $5. The obligation was to pay in coin, and the coin so collected at the custom-house was set apart in a special fund.

That coin was gold. The following is the wording of the act of February 25, 1862, on this point:

SEC. 5. That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent of the entire debt of the United States to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROW. No; I have only five minutes, and I can not yield. If my statement of facts is incorrect, any gentleman can correct it.

The plighted faith of the Government at the beginning of the issuing of the greenbacks was that the duties of the Government should be collected in coin.

Even the greenback was not to be received for customs dues, and that law was never changed until the law was passed providing for the Treasury notes to be issued to pay for the purchase of silver bullion. The greenback is not receivable to-day at the custom-houses, in pursuance of the pledge the Government gave at that time. The Treasury notes given for the purchase of silver bullion were made receivable at the custom-houses. That is the only paper to-day received for duties.

In 1869, in order to strengthen the public credit, an act was passed. How did the public credit get into a condition to need strengthening? It came from the idea that sprang up in Ohio, of which Mr. Pendleton was the father, that the 5-20 bonds could be paid in greenbacks, paid in paper, interest and principal, when the pledge of the Government was to collect its customs dues in coin, and pay that coin, first in interest on the bonds of the Government and its notes, and next to redeem annually 1 per cent of its debt, and its customs dues were collected in gold.

A pledge of the Government was passed then that it would pay its obligations in coin. There was neither gold nor silver in circulation. Coin was put in opposition to paper, and the promise was given that they should not be paid in paper, but should be paid in coin, and coin from 1862 down to 1878 was understood to mean gold. All the discussions in Congress on the issue of greenbacks show that the word "coin" was used generally interchangeably with the word "gold" on the part of everybody discussing the question.

The act of March, 1869, is worded:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States.

In the refunding of the national debt in 1870 the Government pledged itself to pay its obligations "in coin of the present standard value;" that is, the present standard value in 1870. There was no question of weight about it. No one ever thought of counting weight as value until this attempt to use silver to pay off the indebtedness of the Government. In the minds of the silverites of this country 412½ grains of silver in the standard dollar are always of the same value. They are of the same value for debt paying, and that is all.

But there was never any idea on the part of the lawmakers of the country, from 1862 down to the resumption of specie payments, that "coin" meant anything but "gold," and the pledge of the nation to the world which gave it credit was to collect coin at the custom-houses and pay it specifically for the purposes named, and the coin that was collected was gold, and, Mr. Chairman, no bond of the United States has ever yet been paid at its maturity in anything but gold.

The act of July 14, 1870, that authorized the refunding of the national debt, declared that the bonds were payable "in coin of the present standard value." It is value, not weight.

The first bond the United States shall pay in silver will put it out of the markets of the world, except with the credit of Mexico, and it must then sell its bonds at a discount to meet the discredit that has been put upon it by such an act.

These pledges, in three different acts of Congress, only rest upon the broad principle that whoever makes legal tenders to pay debts is under a moral obligation to keep all such legal tenders on the same or nearly the same commercial value.

The private debtor pays in any tender, because he has nothing to do with making the legal tender. Private citizens take their chances in the use of money. The debtor selects whatever legal tender he pleases. That is his right. It is not the right of the Government. The Government could defraud its creditors out of every cent of its obligations, if that doctrine is correct, by making a tender perfectly worthless to pay its debts with. It never was put into law, except on the Treasury notes issued to buy the silver bullion, that the Government had the option to pay its obligations in gold or silver. On those notes it was put in to be paid at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury in gold or silver.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. GROW. I only wish to conclude my remarks on this branch of the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. GROW. When that provision was put in, that the Secretary of the Treasury had the option to pay the Treasury notes in gold or silver, why was that option given to him? There is no other law that does that; never was and never will be while the credit of the Government stands unsuspected and unimpeached in the markets of the world. That option was given to him because the notes were issued for the purchase of silver. Hence, the law makers thought it fair to pay the debt in the article that we received. That was the reason the option was given to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay those Treasury notes in gold or silver, the only option of that kind on any indebtedness of the United States.

In the bonds issued to the Pacific railroads "lawful money" was put in as the mode of payment. Why? We were making the loan to the railroad company. Neither gold nor silver was in circulation. The Government had issued its paper money and made it a legal tender. Hence, they provided that those bonds should be paid in lawful money. That is the only bond ever issued by this Government which contained any such provision, and that was the reason for that. The reason the option was given to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the silver Treasury notes in gold or silver was that the money was used in buying silver bullion.

Good faith and fair business dealing, such as men recognize between man and man, requires this Government to pay all of its obligations, I care not what they are, unless there is a specific mode of payment provided at the time of the contract, in a legal tender specified by its creditor, if there is more than one at the time of payment.

All that this law does is to put on the statute book, in plain and intelligible language, that these obligations of the Government are just what was put in in 1862, except that coin was used then, so as not to discredit the money under $5, which would have to be paid in silver. Hence coin was always used, and no one ever thought, in either branch of Congress, that the bonds of the United States would ever be paid in silver, and never thought that the duties to be collected at custom-houses would be collected in anything but gold, except the smaller sums of less than $5, until the Government made the silver certificate, issued for the purchase of bullion, receivable in that way, thus discrediting the greenback.

No paper was ever authorized to be received in payment of duties until the Treasury notes which were issued for the purchase of silver bullion.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Chairman, I have only asked the indulgence of the House for ten minutes. In that time I can not attempt fully to review the evils of the pending measure. This bill, sir, was never intended by those who are urging its passage to strengthen or reform the currency system of the country. It is not being pressed by them in obedience to any popular necessity or popular demand. It is born of an arrogant overconfidence in the security of their position and in the omnipotence of the evil power that stands behind them. Inflated with pride and drunk with victory they have come to believe that the people will endure any burden that may be laid upon them.

Mr. Chairman, it was said by one reputed to be wiser, perhaps, than even the authors and advocates of this bill that "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." At a time like this, when there is a wave of prosperity due to unusual and extraordinary causes, the people may indeed be tolerant of misgovernment and unjust laws. But let gentlemen beware how far they presume upon the power of corruption and the patience of the American people.

We have been told by Republican leaders, from the President down, that the country is now fixed upon a stable money standard, and that every dollar is as good as gold. We are told that as a result of this condition confidence has been restored, that trade is active, that labor is employed, that the people are enjoying a prosperity unparalleled in the country's history. If all these things be true, whence comes the necessity for this tinkering with the currency?

It was not for the people that this law was framed.

It is provided in the second section that the bonds of the United States shall be payable in gold and not according to the terms of the contract, "in coin." For whose benefit was this provision inserted? Why are not pensions and all other obligations put on the same footing? During the Administration of President Cleveland, when an issue of bonds was to be made of only $50,000,000, the bondholders proposed in effect to pay the Government a difference of $16,000,000 if the bonds were expressly made payable in gold. Congress refused to sanction such a contract and they were made payable in coin. If, sir, those bonds had been made payable in gold and the Government had subsequently changed the terms of the contract so as to make them payable in coin, every holder of those bonds would have cried out that the Government was a robber and a thief.

But now, sir, after the Government has paid $16,000,000 for the right to pay in coin, the bondholders come forward and insolently demand that the terms of the contract shall be again changed for their especial benefit, without any consideration to the Government whatever. I say that this transaction is just as dishonest as the one I have supposed, the only difference being that in this case the Government and the people are being robbed for the benefit of the bondholders. If, sir, the authors of this bill had simply desired to be just to all concerned, why did they not say to the bondholders, "We are ready to deal with you now according to the terms of the proposition you made to the Government during the Cleveland Administration. Bring us your coin bonds and we will give you in exchange a gold bond bearing a lower rate of interest. The Government has paid you for the privilege of paying its bonds in coin and it will not change the contract for your benefit without consideration." We hear, sir, a great deal of honesty and good faith whenever the profits of the bondholders are endangered, but who cares for honor or good faith when only the people are to be robbed? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is proposed in this bill to break "the endless chain" by imposing the greenbacks in the Treasury whenever presented for redemption, whence they are never to be taken except in exchange for gold. This provision, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, will not break the power of those who have habitually manipulated the currency of the country to control prices and to force bond issues. The greenbacks and Treasury notes presented for redemption will be hoarded in the Treasury, the gold will be hoarded in private vaults, and the currency will be contracted to that extent. They can in this way force an issue of bonds whenever they choose.

Mr. Chairman, the greenbacks are constantly represented as a menace to the peace of the Treasury. We heard a great deal during Mr. Cleveland's Administration of the havoc that was wrought by the "endless chain." But what, sir, are the facts? At that time we were suffering from a deficit in the revenues. There was not sufficient money coming into the Treasury through the regular channels to meet current expenditures. The Treasury was holding a reserve of $100,000,000 in gold, available only for redemption purposes. Now, sir, the practical operation of the "endless chain" was that whenever greenbacks were presented for redemption they went into the general fund and became available for current expenses. The Treasury in this way exchanged idle gold for useful greenbacks. Instead of being a burden upon the Treasury, the greenback was its greatest friend in its hour of need. Whenever the current revenues of the Government are sufficient to meet current expenditures every greenback presented for redemption is that much surplus in the Treasury and need not be reissued. The "endless chain" can only operate effectively when there is a deficit in the revenues.

Mr. Chairman, we are informed that the object of this bill is to more firmly establish and perpetuate the single gold standard. Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have argued that present conditions justify the advocates of the gold standard, and put to shame those who followed William J. Bryan in the campaign of 1896. If it does, sir, those who taunt us must share our humiliation, for if there is any one thing upon which the two great political parties were agreed in the campaign of 1896, it was in their advocacy of bimetalism and their opposition to the gold standard. They only differed as to the method by which the end was to be accomplished.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] was one of the most brilliant advocates of bimetalism in that campaign.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; that is not one of my troubles.

Mr. CARMACK. Oh, I know it is not now, but it used to be. I do not know exactly when my friend got over it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I trust my friend will take his object lesson from those who are victims of that delusion.

Mr. CARMACK. Well, if my friend was not afflicted in that way, he certainly had some very violent symptoms. [Laughter.]

The whole Republican party in 1896, from the President down, was unequivocally committed to bimetalism, just as much as the Democratic party was; but my friend has suddenly undergone a transformation, for in reply to a question from my colleague [Mr. SIMS] he heaped scorn upon the platform of his own party and declared himself an uncompromising champion of the single gold standard. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, in the first Congress that assembled after the election in 1896, a gentleman from New York by the name of Lemuel Eli Quigg had the audacity to stand on this floor and utter just such a sentiment as that proclaimed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. In an instant the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the gentleman from Iowa now in the chair [Mr. HEPBURN] pounced with ferocity upon that unfortunate person, and when they got through with Lemuel Eli his mother would not have known him if she had met him at the door. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Iowa now presiding read the Republican platform of 1896, denounced the assertion that it had pledged the Republican party to the gold standard, and declared that any Republican who opposed bimetalism was an apostate to Republicanism and faithless to the pledges of the Republican party. Mr. Chairman, I thought it would be interesting to my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] to know what his distinguished colleague who is now in the chair thinks of his conduct. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I would be glad to know how many more recreants and apostates there are on that side of the Chamber. If there are any who disagree with my friend from Iowa, let them stand up. It is interesting, Mr. Chairman, to see the entire Republican party, from the President down, abandoning its platform and its pledges and rallying to a new war cry under the glorious leadership of Lemuel Eli Quigg. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, let us pause for a moment to ask whether in fact present conditions have vindicated the advocates of the gold standard in the last campaign. Let us see what was the issue joined between the Republican and Democratic parties in that campaign. The Democrats contended that the free coinage of silver would increase the prices of commodities and that rising prices meant prosperity. Our opponents admitted that the free coinage of silver would cause a rise in prices, but they said that the effect of this would be ruin and disaster. The Democrats declared that the effect of the gold standard was to depress prices and that this meant depression in trade and universal hard times. The Republicans admitted that the effect of the gold standard was to beat down the prices of commodities, but they declared that this condition was favorable to the great masses of the people.

The real issue joined between us and the question of debate was between higher and lower prices. Wherever you went you declared it was your purpose to increase the purchasing power of the workingman's dollar by keeping down the prices of all the necessities of life. You appealed to the great army of pensioners throughout the country by telling them that the Democrats would increase prices and thereby diminish the value of their income. One of the greatest advocates of the gold standard made a speech in my city in which he said that he was glad that the prices of farm products were low, and he hoped they would go lower, because the lower they went the greater would be the purchasing power of the poor man's dollar.

Now, sir, it is true that we have better times; it is true that we have a measure of prosperity; but it has come with a rise in the prices of commodities, with a decrease in the purchasing power of every dollar in the country. It has come through the very conditions which it was the avowed purpose of the gold standard to prevent. It has come through the very conditions which you yourselves have said the free coinage of silver would create.

Why, sir, your candidate for President, Mr. McKinley, declared that he was opposed to any policy that would reduce the purchasing power of the dollar, or, in other words, to any policy that would increase prices. Yet you have the nerve to stand here and boast of the fact that prices have increased and that the purchasing power of the dollar has decreased. Has your policy brought this about? If so, I want to tell you that Mr. McKinley is opposed to it. [Laughter.] You solemnly promised in the last campaign that you would defeat the base conspiracy to increase prices and thereby reduce the purchasing power of the workingman's dollar, and now you think you ought to have a chromo because you have failed to do it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to say something with regard to the real causes of improved conditions and also in regard to the increased gold supply so often adverted to in this debate. But I see that my time is about to expire, and I can not enter upon the discussion of those questions.

I thank the House for its very courteous attention. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I should have been entirely content to leave this bill where it now is, in so far as this discussion is concerned. It needs nothing that I could say for it. That it will pass the House is certain. But the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] a few moments ago dropped a remark that I think requires attention here, and as a citizen of Ohio, having an interest in the great men whose fame constitutes a part of the glory of our State, I am not content to allow what he said to pass without comment, though necessarily it must be brief.

I understood the gentleman to say, much after a fashion that has prevailed upon that side of the House during the little time that I have been a member, that one of our citizens—a man who was born in our State, who lived his boyhood in our State, who grew to manhood in our State, and who was honored by the people of our State and respected by all parties in our State—was a "pseudo man," or a "pseudo President." I am not certain which was the exact remark that he made, and I am not very particular which it was. What is a pseudo thing? The dictionary states that it is a term that signifies false, counterfeit, pretended, or spurious.

Mr. Chairman, when the history of this country comes to be written, free from the partisan animosity that manifests itself on the other side of this Hall at times, it will never be said of the boy or the man, the Congressman, the governor, or the President, Rutherford B. Hayes, that he was false, that he was counterfeit, that he was pretended, or that he was spurious.

Who was Rutherford B. Hayes, who is assailed by this sort of recklessness, by this sort of vituperation, by this sort of slander that does not end even when the grave hides his mortal remains—the remains of one whose good name and fame will live long beyond the time that the gentleman from Missouri and I are figuring in our small way on this stage of action?

Who, I say, was Rutherford B. Hayes? I can tell you who he was. After the massacre of Massachusetts soldiers in the streets of Baltimore, at the beginning of the civil war in 1861, this young Ohio man, Rutherford B. Hayes, writing to a friend, speaking of Stanley Matthews, another illustrious and worthy young Ohioan, said this:

Matthews and I have agreed to go into the service for the war; if possible, into the same regiment. I spoke my feelings to him, which he said were his also, namely, that this was a just and necessary war; that it demanded the whole power of the country, and that I would prefer to go into it if I knew I was to die or be killed in the course of it rather than to live through and after it without taking any part in it.

There was nothing false, counterfeit, pretended, or spurious in or about this manly and patriotic declaration. On the contrary, it was the real thing. It was the brave and glowing spirit of patriotism, the spirit which then broke into full flame throughout the loyal land and never ceased to burn with consuming power until war ended in the restoration of the Union.

Let me go a little further; and I ought to have taken time to get better prepared, but I did not want the words of the gentleman to get cold before some citizen of the State of Ohio secured the floor and resented them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWN. I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more, and that I may have five minutes in which to reply.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BROWN. One of the biographers of this Ohio man, Rutherford B. Hayes, writing about the battle of South Mountain, says this, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the language:

Lieutenant-Colonel Hayes soon after again made his appearance on the field, with his wound half dressed, and fought against the remonstrances of the whole command, until carried off.

I should have thought the gentleman's regard for bravery, for heroic character, for the courage that wins for a soldier an encomium like this for gallantry on the field of battle, would prevent the application to him of the language which fell from the lips of the gentleman from Missouri to-day. Let me read one more extract. Speaking of the battle of Opequan, the biographer uses this language, referring to Hayes:

He was everywhere exposing himself recklessly as usual. He was the first over the slough; he was in advance of the line half the time afterward; his adjutant-general was severely wounded; men were dropping all around him, but he rode through it all as if he had a charmed life.

That was the boy, that the man, that the soldier, whom Ohio saw fit to reckon as one of her great citizens, and may the day be long distant when we cease to give him the credit that belongs to him. He moved to Hamilton County and practiced his profession—that of a lawyer—a county which adjoins that in which I live. He was an honorable practitioner. He was afterwards sent to this House. Later he became governor of the State of Ohio, and afterwards, by the larger call of the citizens of the Republic, he became President of the United States. And I want to say this: That whatever opinion may be held as to any particular measure of the Administration of President Hayes, it was pure and clean, as he was himself pure and clean. It was guided by intelligence. The love of country which inspired the soldier inspired the President. How did Hayes come into the Presidency? I answer, legally, constitutionally, and rightfully. Is the truth never to be acknowledged by the political enemies of Hayes? Is the hatred of those who lost never to disappear? I have only time to declare that through all the temptations and perils of a close and contested Presidential election Rutherford B. Hayes bore himself every day and every hour as the honest, fair, upright man that he was, and that, notwithstanding all that is or can be said, no stain, however slight, attaches to the record of this period of his honorable career.

And I recall to the memory of gentlemen on the other side of the House the fact that President Hayes was one of the first of the public men of the North, one of the first of the leading Republicans of the North, one of the first of the soldiers of the North, to extend the olive branch to the old Confederates. In making up his Cabinet you will remember that it was President Hayes who went to Tennessee for his Postmaster-General and selected a man who had worn the uniform of the Confederacy. This fact you will surely remember to the credit of Hayes this day, this happier and better day, when in the North and in the South, on that side of the aisle and this, we are thankful for the restoration of the sentiment that makes us one people now and henceforth. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWN. I ask for two minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN. I want only a little more time. Rutherford B. Hayes was of Ohio birth. He was an Ohio boy, an Ohio soldier, an Ohio Representative in this House, an Ohio governor, and an Ohio President. As a boy he was industrious, energetic, and ambitious; as a lawyer he was honorable and able; as a soldier he was true and courageous; as a Representative, as governor, and as President he was intelligent, capable, and patriotic. After he left the Presidency he went back to Ohio and became the dignified but unassuming and kind-hearted citizen. He was a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. The last time I saw him was at one of the camp fires of that great organization, where he was the central figure, the welcome guest, the loved comrade, and when he died there were no more sincere mourners at his grave than the brave men who had served with him in the Army of the Union. He sleeps now in an honorable grave. Whatever Missouri may do, we in Ohio will defend his memory. His life and deeds fill one bright page of the shining record that tells the story of the many good and great men of our glorious State. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that my friend from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] should take exceptions to my applying the word pseudo to Rutherford B. Hayes. That is a very mild term in his case, it appears to me. That pure, illustrious, superb Republican, Roscoe Conkling, always spoke of Hayes as Rutherford B. Hayes. I never said that Rutherford B. Hayes was a "pseudo-man." I think he gave ample evidence that he was of the male gender. I said that he was a "pseudo-President," and I repeat the statement. I accept the gentleman's definition that he was a "counterfeit President." [Laughter on the Democratic side.] A genuine coin is one made by legitimate authority; a counterfeit is made by illegitimate authority. Other Presidents of the United States were made by the people. Hayes was made President by that infamous eight to seven commission [applause on the Democratic side], the "eight" of whom Judge Jeremiah S. Black denounced as "blistered, perjured miscreants." I do not care if he was a brave soldier. Benedict Arnold was a brave soldier, but he sleeps in a grave of obloquy.

I say this, I am not hidebound about politics. [Laughter.] There are great and distinguished Republicans. I have great admiration for Abraham Lincoln. I claim a part of the honor of Grant's fame as an American citizen. Garfield was a wonder of learning and brains. The younger Harrison was far above the average President in character and capacity. I admire McKinley in some respects, but I entertain a supreme contempt, although he is in the grave, for Hayes, because he stole the Presidency of the United States, the greatest crime committed in all the flood of time. I do not care if he is dead. Public men live after they are buried. They live in their records. I wish Hayes had been compelled to live forever and had had to bear the scorn of decent men until the end of the world itself. The shot fired at Sumter, which was heard around the world, was not so great a shock to republican institutions as was the fact that Hayes, never elected, should sit in the Presidential chair; and upon his tombstone this legend should appear: "Here lies a man who committed the monumental crime against human liberty." Now, if they can make anything out of that let them make it. [Laughter on Democratic side.]

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, the day on which this bill becomes a law will mark the beginning of a new period in American history—a radical change in our monetary system. Therefore, while I have refrained from participating in the general debate, out of a desire to give opportunity to many gentlemen who are new acquisitions to the House to be heard, I can not be content with the appearance of my vote alone in the official record of this Congress without having it reinforced by a word of protest against a most unfortunate and iniquitous measure. It will afford me satisfaction in the future, if I should live to see the logical results of this legislation—and unless I die before my time I believe I will—to remember that I was not a silent witness of the perpetration of a great wrong.

I would ask, Mr. Chairman, by what authority this measure is to be forced on the country? Who has demanded it, sir? What influences in the land are impelling Congress to pass this measure, bringing the country by the enactment of law to the gold standard? The great campaign of 1896 was conducted, not upon the question as to whether we should be a bimetallic or monometallic Government, but whether the United States should independently coin gold and silver free at the ratio of 16 to 1. The Democratic party came boldly to the assertion that the Government of the United States was able by herself, acting courageously and independently, to give our people a bimetallic standard of gold and silver on terms of perfect equality. We then contended that the gold standard was an evil thing not to be desired; that a bimetallic standard was a good thing, and that it was to be desired because it would give us more good metallic money. We did it in the light of past history, the past history of our own Government and of the world; in the light of economic science; in the light of the wise counsels of economic scholars; we did it at the demand of our people for more money to make life more prosperous for them and its burdens more tolerable.

The Republicans did not say we should not have bimetallicism. They insisted that we ought to have a bimetallic standard. They put it in their platform unequivocally, and promised their honest efforts to bring it about, in the St. Louis convention in 1896, after having a few years before that, in 1888, denounced Grover Cleveland and the Democratic party for trying to demonetize silver. They said "the gold standard is a bad thing, and we promise the country they shall not have it; we will strive for a bimetallic standard, but the only way it can be obtained is by international agreement." They said "the Democrats are crazy; they are wild on this subject. Our Government is not strong enough to accomplish it acting by itself. We will do it in the orthodox, proper way. We will get the consent of the powers of Europe to accomplish it, and then the people can have the blessing of a bimetallic standard."

We went to the country. There were more than 13,000,000 men who voted in that great election; and of all those who voted, the only ones who voted for the single gold standard were those who followed Palmer and Buckner, one hundred and thirty-odd thousand in number. All the rest voted for the double standard of money.

I ask, therefore, again of the Republican party by what authority they enact this law? The people have not spoken since 1896. Who demands it, then? We all know, everybody knows, it is the banker, the capitalist, the creditor—the great creditor class demand it. The capitalist demands it because it will make his money worth more to him and everything that money buys worth less.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. DINSMORE. Those are the classes in this country to whose interest this legislation will redound; whether that is the motive in the minds of gentlemen who are about to enact it into law or not, they are the inspiration behind this measure. That influence, without whose aid the Republican party would be a powerless political organization, the influence of wealth ill got. We speak to-day for the people who voted for William McKinley in the contest of 1896, as well as those who voted for Bryan. They did it by the thousands, upon the faith of the pledges made to them that they could have bimetallicism, upon the faith of the declarations made by the President himself, for whom I have unmeasured respect, as a citizen and a gentleman of most courtly and generous characteristics. I believe that Mr. McKinley was honest and sincere as a bimetallicist and that he thought his party would try to bring bimetallicism about; but his masters are stronger than he. He can not be a Republican President and be loyal to the interests of all the people or even loyal to the promises he and his party have made.

We have been amused—perhaps I should not say amused, because of the gravity of the situation, because the evils which are involved and with which this measure is fraught are so great that however grotesque may be the situation of our friends on the other side of this Chamber, it is too serious a matter for amusement. Let us say it has been pathetic to see them come into this great confessional, one by one, acknowledging their past errors, errors of a generation (if they have been errors), and announcing a new doctrine, a new faith, and claiming that they have progressed into the regeneration of the single gold standard. My distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the other day, in response to the unkind reminders of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], said:

Conditions have changed and I have progressed. I live in the present, without pride of opinion, ready to meet the present emergencies, and he [Mr. RICHARDSON] dwells with the ghouls of ancient graveyards.

Ghouls and graveyards indeed! Ghouls of Republican broken faith, graveyards of buried hopes, inspired by Republican promises, unkept and dead. My friend the distinguished and honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is also a progressor, and in his remarks took occasion to felicitate himself and his colleagues that God abides with the Republican party. In truth, Mr. Chairman, it does seem that God is with them now, for what inscrutable purpose I do not know, but He moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform. A temporary and partial prosperity has visited the country with new and largely increased gold production and with the enormous demands incident to two years of war. Business has been stimulated and revived by these causes, and but for the conditions they bring the majority would not have dared to unmask themselves and propose this bill.

Prosperity has in a measure come. For this blessing we owe our thanks to the Divine God and not to the Republican party. Every assertion of the Democratic party with reference to bimetallicism has been vindicated by the situation that now exists. Ours was the quantity theory of money. You derided it. You now congratulate the country that money is abundant. Why do you do so, and why is it abundant? Because the gold supply has been doubled and we have a product of gold equal to the supply of both gold and silver in the past. The volume of that product has been increased, and in addition a war has been waging for two years, unlocking millions of dollars from every secret sleeping place and putting them out into the arteries of commerce and trade. There is another war on the other side of the world, which has increased demand for our merchandise, and hence the money in our country. Men are now in my country buying mules to ship to Africa to meet the demands of the British army.

These things have vitalized industry for the present; but when the war ceases, Mr. Chairman, when again the mines close up their mouths and the yellow stream ceases to come forth for the use of men and we go down again into a dearth of money, as history shows has ever occurred in the past; when the wars are ended and expenditures are reduced, then these same gentlemen who boast of their progress will bewail the evil hour when they went back upon their promises of the past and gave themselves over utterly to Mammon and the golden calf.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, one word further. My distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] has had something to say about inconsistencies, and my friend has had the misfortune to commit himself in a moment of prophetic condition to a suggestion on this very question. This was not a question of protective tariff that he was talking about; it was another question. I should like to ask him, "Have we had free and unlimited coinage?" and he will say "No." Then, how much will your opinion to-day be worth in the light of what you said on the 30th of March, 1897? I will read it:

Mr. Chairman, when a Congress shall come here and pursue the policy which was laid down in the Democratic platform and give us a bimetallic currency in this country—give us a currency which will prevent this constant absorption of the value of property into an enlarged and enhanced dollar—then we may see prosperity come, but not till then. While the hiatus between money and property is widening and widening there never can, in my judgment, be prosperity.

What we need is a return to silver and gold as standard money, and the people will have it yet, whether you will or no. Until we return to real bimetalism there can be no prosperity, and you in this House are afraid to put yourselves on record against it and admit the necessity for it. When a proposition came up on the other side of this Chamber upon the question of money and an international agreement, there were only four gentlemen over there who had the courage to stand up and say by their votes that they believed in the gold standard, which every one of you advocated all over the country on the stump last fall.

Now the gentleman comes to-day and thanks the Lord for prosperity. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Well, I want to remind the gentleman that, good as the Lord is, gracious as He has been to the American people, He always works through instrumentalities, and at present He seems to be operating through the instrumentality of the Republican Administration. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the few remarks I am about to make will not be as an argument for or against this bill; I desire to give expression to my constituency, whom I have the honor to represent.

There may be some defects in this important measure, but the main feature—the establishment of a gold standard and removing the currency question from the field of politics—makes my position in supporting this bill truly a representative not only of my own district but also of sentiments of a majority of the people of the entire State of New York.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the provisions of this bill can be with entire safety begun by its opponents with the statement that at the present time there has been a relaxation of the hard times and great business depression for so many years prevalent.

That such relaxation should have taken place is entirely natural, in accordance with the laws of nature in all her creations, and in accordance with the teachings of history.

Prosperity and depression have succeeded one another at intervals regular and irregular. For years the ingenuity of the statesman and politician alike have been exercised to discover a panacea for the evils of depressed times and conditions. Their search has been equally vain with the search of mankind for the "philosopher's stone" and the "fountain of perpetual youth." I believe at all times it will be vain. No honest man of sound mind, whatever may be his party affiliations, will give the credit of the present change to legislation. Despite what has been vainly boasted by prejudiced, ignorant, or credulous men, no law has been enacted which can claim the present improved conditions as the result of its enforcement.

As a general proposition, the prayer of the American people has been, "Stop legislating for business; let business work out its own salvation; leave it alone to be governed by its natural laws. Take away the brakes and clogs at present upon it; let it stand on its own natural base, and you will have done the country and its people a world of good."

Would this not be a good rule to follow now, instead of again seeking to hamper our returning prosperity by the enactment of this piece of legislation, which at best will create a change of values and affect the credits of the people of this land?

It would be a happy plan to follow the good old rule of letting well enough alone.

Nor has there been a good reason so far given why this bill should be enacted into law. Its advocates say we are to-day, in practice and in reality, upon a gold-standard basis. If we take for granted, for the sake of argument, that statement to be true, then why enact the first section of this bill or any other section?

Throughout the length and breadth of this land I find no one among the working masses asking for it.

The national banks of the land, except those of the great cities, perhaps, are not asking an enactment of any of the national-bank clauses. Did they desire it, our country banks, I mean, would not be backward in asserting their wishes. Not one has said a word, sent a delegation, sent a letter or a telegram asking me to support it.

On the contrary, they want to be left alone. Those who do an honest, fair, and useful business all ask to be let alone and not interfered with.

I well remember that on one occasion a proposition came up before the senate of Pennsylvania on third reading and final passage on a Thursday to take a tax levied by the State off of manufacturing corporations. All through that week, every hour, every minute, aye, almost every second, a message came by mail or wire, delegation after delegation appeared upon the scene, until the legislature was fairly inundated with messages, letters, and pleadings. Is that the case with this bill? It certainly is not. But a small coterie of speculators are the brains and substance behind this bill.

I have said that times have been improving, and not the result of legislation.

What, then, has been the cause, or rather causes, for they are legion? Some appear on the surface; some lie deeper, and their results can be traced with greater difficulty.

Among the most apparent has been the famine in India and the general short crops of cereals entering into the manufacture of bread throughout the consuming world, with the particular and almost single exception of the United States. Then the short, nay, almost total failure of the great Cuban tobacco crop, owing to the long period of war in that country, has given a direct stimulus and greatly enhanced the price of our native tobaccos. The certain falling off in the quantity of this year's cotton crop and its attendant rise in price has assisted such portions of the country where the crop was good or fair.

Then this country has been for over a year engaged in war, and the expenditures of this Government have been enormously increased. All the material and articles of manufacture and consumption required by the Government in carrying on this war, from this unnatural demand, have risen in price and their production stimulated by this demand. The stocks in the stores and at the manufacturing plants, which for a number of years have been allowed to run down to their very lowest point, had to be replenished. The wear and tear on our railroads had to be replaced. Projected improvements and absolutely needed repairs had to be resumed, and were only waiting for a time when it was possible to move on. The slack occasioned by the long season of depression had to be taken up.

But added to this, and the most important reason for the present resumption of business enterprises, has been the large output from the new and old gold fields of the world. This has been abnormal, and this has in large part gone directly into the money, the circulating medium of the commercial world.

Neither the advocates nor the opponents of this bill deny that there has been by reason of this increased output of gold an increase in the circulating medium, and both now, perhaps for the first time, agree that prosperity is never possible without there being a sufficient quantity of money in circulation. The greater the quantity, the greater the business activity.

Is it not a good time, instead of passing new legislation, to leave business alone, naturally to resume its natural channels, aiding it only by providing, so far as it is possible to do so by legislation, an increased supply instead of diminishing this quantity of money under the pretext of adding to its quality? This is a plain business proposal, which requires no juggling with statistics nor any abstruse theories to determine. It can be understood by laymen.

But there are many other evils inherent in this bill. The bill creates a great change in the values of the bonded indebtedness of the United States. By reading into these contracts the "gold clause" it largely increases the value of those issued and now in the hands of the money lenders and bondholders, which are very largely confined to the wealthy corporations and money kings, who have by favored legislation largely absorbed the results of the producing and laboring classes of the country.

But, more than this, this increased value and unjust profit created by the provisions of this bill is at the direct expense of the taxpayers of the land.

Not content with this injustice and highway robbery, it goes still a step farther; it reads into every mortgage, bond, note, or certificate of indebtedness, into every contract to pay given by the private individual, this much detested and much feared gold clause.

I well know what consternation was created in the community in which I live a few short years ago by a few of the money-lending individuals and corporations endeavoring to have the contracts already existing changed so that they were payable in gold. With all the necessities of the debtor class, which were exceeding great at that time, they were able to accomplish it only in a small part. There was a revolt, and such names as "thieves" and "shylocks" were most forcibly applied to those who sought to make this change. This bill at one fell swoop seeks to write into every debtor's contract this dreaded and objectionable word.

If I judge the debtor classes aright, the men who perpetrate this outrage by voting for the pending bill will feel the heavy hand of a constituency whose interest, instead of defending, they have betrayed. Ponder on the seer's warning to the highland chief:

Lochiel, Lochiel, beware of the day
When the lowlands shall meet thee in battle array;
For a field of the dead rushes red on my sight,
And the clans of Culloden are scattered in flight.

What hope have you for the continuance of the present condition of affairs? Only one, the continued increase and increasing output of the gold mines. That is the only ground upon which you have any right to base such hope.

The pockets of the Klondike are fast being exhausted. No large deposits of gold have been found in Alaska recently. California had its day, quickly reached its climax in the production of gold, and declined. The expense of mining in the Arctic region is enormous. The rush of the multitude to these parts is over. The cost of labor with a decreased and constantly decreasing labor market must largely increase. Only new and rich finds can be relied upon, and this, as ever in the past, is largely problematical. The output from the gold fields of the Transvaal, for a time at least, will or rather has almost entirely stopped. Working the lower levels is more expensive each year. A rise in the price of Kaffir labor will render them entirely unprofitable, and that rise it is but natural to expect. With that the yield of gold decreases.

If a gold standard is established in this great commercial country the increased demand must increase its purchasing power when measured by commodities. How much harder will it be for the debtor classes to meet their obligations, interest and principal? Then your day of reckoning will come. Who will pity you? Not the men of your own party whom you have plundered. Surely not those who have warned you of a crisis which may be expected in a few short years at least.

You have another reason for not pressing this measure, one which can not be overlooked by the lowest among you. Its passage will break your promises to the very people by whose votes you occupy your seats upon the floor of this House. You promised them bimetalism. I care not what kind or in what manner it was to be brought about, still it was bimetalism, not the gold standard.

You will, if you pass this bill, do more to defeat international bimetalism than any thing you could do. Philanthropists and humanitarians, not only in this country but throughout the world, have for years been working for this result. They have been striving to bring in the era when in all the world gold and silver will be used as money, primary money, side by side at a fixed ratio. You, under this guise and protestations of friendship, have done your best to postpone the time of the consummation of international bimetalism. One hope remains to them, that the reaction may be sharp and sudden, so that the evil results of your action will be less seriously felt. The educated and enlightened world, the unselfish and humane world, believe in bimetalism, and your action will create a reaction you little dream of; and it may be in the fitness of things this very action of yours will hasten the day of its general establishment among the nations of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out for the purpose of the ornamentation, as it were, of this debate that if all that is alleged on the other side as true be true, which we deny, about the inconsistency and change of front of the Republican party we have had a most illustrious example set by the Democratic party. It may take me about ten minutes to remind gentlemen on the other side of the history that they themselves have made during the last fifteen years. Going back to 1884, when you nominated Grover Cleveland, you put a sound-money plank into your platform and used for the first time in a national platform, as I remember, the words "sound money."

A MEMBER. Honest money.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Honest money; I meant that. But they are convertible terms.

Now, Mr. Cleveland put his construction very early upon that platform, and he did it in a way to give it special emphasis for the people of the country. He did not wait to take his place as President.

He feared that the Democratic party might not quite understand the terms of their platform, and so, before he was sworn into office, he wrote a letter to a distinguished gentleman, formerly a member of this House from Albany, on the 24th of February, 1885. I shall put that letter in full into my remarks, under the order of the House, so that my friends on the other side can have it within reach at all times [laughter] as a landmark of the movements and travel through which they have passed.

He gave notice to the Democratic party that the coinage of silver ought to be stopped. Here is a single sentence. Speaking about the necessity of maintaining sound money, he says, "This is possible by a present suspension of the purchase and coinage of silver." That was the first public declaration by any distinguished and prominent man in favor of the crime of 1873 and the perpetration of the single gold standard.

Now, then, my friends will say, "But that was Grover Cleveland; what have we to do with that?" Four years afterwards, my friends, when Grover Cleveland had lived right square up to that platform at every step of his way, you renominated him for President of the United States.

That was not all; recognizing the distinct utterance that he had made, notwithstanding that we had reached the period of 1888 and this discussion of the question of silver had been going on all that time, you did not put a word into your platform on the subject-matter of silver. Cleveland was defeated for President. Then came 1892, and so fond were you, and every one of you, of the great champion of the gold standard, and the great enemy of bimetalism, and the sworn foe of free silver, that you renominated him for the third time, and adopted a single gold standard platform, as I will show you.

Your platform in 1892 declares in favor of money in the following terms:

We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, when we come to you with a message that as to both these propositions is the very beacon light of its purpose, you undertake to denounce us for having changed front upon this question. You were on the gold standard in 1892.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will.

Mr. LENTZ. Is it not a fact that you ran for Congress in 1894 on a platform that favored an increase of the currency to $40 per capita, as they had done in the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should not be surprised. I ran on the Republican platform of Ohio, whatever that was. [Laughter and applause.] You can always charge me with having been in accord with the Republican platform when I run for office.

Mr. SULZER. Right or wrong.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have never changed very suddenly, like my colleague, in my views. Whatever change I have made has been of a gradual character. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LENTZ. I think the gentleman is in the habit of changing so gracefully that we do not see when he does it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. My colleague, when he does it, does it in such an awkward way that we can all of us see it. [Laughter.]

Now, my friends, that was your platform. You were not only willing to use words of doubtful import, but you wanted to make the people of the country understand that there was something left of the old Jacksonian Democracy on your side, and so you put in that very idea that this money should be "interchangeable and of equal intrinsic value." Now, that is a good platform for the soundest Democrat on earth; that is all that we want to get, and if you will get out of our way we will be there in a very short time. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, one word further. My distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], has had something to say about inconsistencies, and my friend has had the misfortune to commit himself in a moment of prophetic condition to a suggestion on this very question. This was not a question of protective tariff that he was talking about; it was another question. I should like to ask him, "Have we had free and unlimited coinage?" and he will say "No." Then, how much will your opinion to-day be worth in the light of what you said on the 30th of March, 1897? I will read it:

Mr. Chairman, when a Congress shall come here and pursue the policy which was laid down in the Democratic platform and give us a bimetallic currency in this country—give us a currency which will prevent this constant absorption of the value of property into an enlarged and enhanced dollar—then we may see prosperity come, but not till then. While the hiatus between money and property is widening and widening there never can, in my judgment, be prosperity.

What we need is a return to silver and gold as standard money, and the people will have it yet, whether you will or no. Until we return to real bimetalism there can be no prosperity, and you in this House are afraid to put yourselves on record against it and admit the necessity for it. When a proposition came up on the other side of this Chamber upon the question of money and an international agreement, there were only four gentlemen over there who had the courage to stand up and say by their votes that they believed in the gold standard, which every one of you advocated all over the country on the stump last fall.

Now the gentleman comes to-day and thanks the Lord for prosperity. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Well, I want to remind the gentleman that, good as the Lord is, gracious as He has been to the American people, He always works through instrumentalities, and at present He seems to be operating through the instrumentality of the Republican Administration. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The letter is as follows:

ALBANY, February 24, 1885.

The Hon. A. J. WARNER and others,
Members of the Forty-eighth Congress.

GENTLEMEN: The letter which I have had the honor to receive from you in vites, and, indeed, obliges, me to give expression to some grave public necessities, although in advance of the moment when they would become the objects of my official care and partial responsibility. Your solicitude that my judgment shall have been carefully and deliberately formed is entirely just, and I accept the suggestion in the same friendly spirit in which it has been made.

It is also fully justified by the nature of the financial crisis which, under the operation of the act of Congress of February 28, 1878, is now close at hand. By a compliance with the requirements of that law all the vaults of the Federal Treasury have been and are heaped full of silver coins, which are now worth less than 85 per cent of the gold dollar prescribed as "the unit of value" in section 14 of the act of February 12, 1873, and which, with the silver certificates representing such coin, are receivable for all public dues. Being thus receivable, while also constantly increasing in quantity at the rate of $28,000,000 a year, it has followed of necessity that the flow of gold into the Treasury has been steadily diminished.

Silver and silver certificates have displaced and are now displacing gold, and the sum of gold in the Federal Treasury now available for the payment of the gold obligations of the United States and for the redemption of the United States notes called "greenbacks," if not already encroached upon, is perilously near such encroachment. These are facts which, as they do not admit of difference of opinion, call for no argument. They have been forewarned to us in the official reports of every Secretary of the Treasury from 1878 till now. They are plainly affirmed in the last December report of the present Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the present House of Representatives. They appear in the official documents of this Congress and in the records of the New York clearing house, of which the Treasury is a member and through which the bulk of the receipts and payments of the Federal Government and of the country pass.

These being the facts of our present condition, our danger and our duty to avert that danger would seem to be plain. I hope that you concur with me and with the great majority of our fellow-citizens in deeming it most desirable at the present juncture to maintain and continue in use the mass of our gold coin as well as the mass of silver already coined. This is possible by a present suspension of the purchase and coinage of silver. I am not aware that by any other method it is possible.

It is of momentous importance to prevent the two metals from parting company; to prevent the increasing displacement of gold by the increasing coinage of silver; to prevent the disuse of gold in the custom-houses of the United States in the daily business of the people; to prevent the ultimate expulsion of gold by silver. Such a financial crisis as these events would certainly precipitate, were it now to follow upon so long a period of commercial depression, would involve the people of every city and every State in the Union in a prolonged and disastrous trouble. The revival of business enterprise and prosperity, so ardently desired and apparently so near, would be hopelessly postponed.

Gold would be withdrawn to its hoarding places, and an unprecedented contraction in the actual volume of our currency would speedily take place. Saddest of all, in every workshop, mill, factory, store, and on every railroad and farm, the wages of labor, already depressed, would suffer still further depression by a scaling down of the purchasing power of every so-called dollar paid into the hand of toil. From these impending calamities it is surely a most patriotic and grateful duty of the representatives of the people to deliver them.

I am, gentlemen, with sincere respect, your fellow-citizen,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I had the misfortune to be out of the Hall when my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] began to refer to me and what I said, but I did hear what he read from the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to my friend from Arkansas that that was the only reference I made to him.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to that. I reassert what I said on that day, in the sense in which it was then used. I meant then that there could be no permanent prosperity in this country with a single gold standard, because the gold of the world is inadequate to supply the people with sufficient basic money.

I say so now. In my remarks a few moments ago I stated that we are in a season of temporary prosperity, and I mentioned the causes. Now, sir, the very cause of the prosperity that we have to-day is what I was asking for when I had the honor to speak on the floor at the time the gentleman has referred to, the abundance of money, though accomplished by different means. But I meant abundance of money permanently for the people. We are now enjoying the benefits of discoveries of gold which have added vastly, and almost without precedent, to the gold stock of the country, and made our gold money sufficient to meet the deficit which would have happened provided the discoveries had not been made.

In addition to that, we must recognize the fact that hitherto the money was locked up in the strong boxes of the country. There was lack of opportunity for investment to bring a return to capitalists. That money was not in use; but we went to war, and the war created a demand on the part of the Government for the use of millions of money—hundreds of millions—that came out of hiding and was invested. Moreover, there was a strong demand on the population of the country to supply soldiers, and these men have now occupation, leaving a smaller number of men to compete for occupation in the home industries. These causes have brought about a stimulus of the business of the country, which has increased its prosperity.

But the time will come, Mr. Chairman, as it has come in the past, and I am justified by all the history of the world from the beginning, when these temporary causes will cease to exist, when the supply of gold will again fall short, when grim-visaged war will smooth his wrinkled front, our soldiers return to peaceful occupations and claim their places as workers, when the circulation caused by war expenditures will be again restricted. Then when the supply of money fails, when the wars have ceased, when we are brought back under the gold standard and decline of prices come, gold will begin to climb again and prices grow less and less, to the misery of the people. If it does not happen history will reverse itself and experience is no safe guide for the conduct of men.

Mr. Chairman, I have confined myself to an effort to expose the false claims of the majority made in attempt to justify this atrocious bill, and could not in this brief manner attempt to discuss its various provisions, all of which are bad.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute.

Mr. DINSMORE. I thank my friend from Georgia. I am sorry I took up his time.

Mr. FLEMING. I have no doubt it was better occupied than if I had occupied it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Arkansas was recognized in his own right, and will now recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLEMING].

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, since this debate began a number of gentlemen upon the other side of the House have lauded President McKinley as the chief factor in the establishment of the single gold standard. A few moments ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] reverted to the historical record in the case, and he makes it plain to this House that the credit is not due to President McKinley but to ex-President Cleveland. There may be some difference of opinion among gentlemen as to which of these two Presidents of the United States is entitled to the greater credit for establishing the gold standard; but in my opinion the impartial historian, when he comes to write the truth of the situation, will say that the honor or the dishonor, the glory or the shame (whichever it may eventually prove to be) of having fastened that financial policy upon this country will belong, not to President McKinley, but to President Cleveland.

But, Mr. Chairman, that was not my purpose in rising. I wish to discuss one serious and grievous injustice which it seems to me is connected with the practical operations of this bill, in connection with the peculiar tax system of the United States. I have no doubt that this bill will accomplish the object for which it was intended. The experts of the Republican party, assisted by the experts of the Democratic gold party, have expended their best efforts upon it, and all the Republican members of this House, in caucus assembled, have unanimously indorsed it. With so much of brains behind this measure, I would not be rash enough to doubt that it will accomplish the identical purposes for which it was framed.

But what are those purposes? Chiefly, they are two: First, to establish the gold standard and make gold the only money of final redemption in the United States; second, to give the national banks unrestricted power to control the volume of the currency. I am opposed to the bill because I am opposed to both these objects. I am opposed to taking such action now as will prevent the Government of the United States from using silver as a money of final redemption under any and all possible emergencies of the future. I am opposed to giving the national banks any greater power to control the destinies of the people of this country than they have to-day.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. FLEMING. I will if my time will permit.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you not remember that in its platform of 1892 the Democratic party provided for the removal of the 10 per cent tax on bank circulation, so that the banks could have all the money?

Mr. FLEMING. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that is an entirely different question. You gentlemen here are going into a financial system under which the currency of the country is obliged to depend on the indebtedness of the country, and when the people clamor for more money to carry on their business these controllers and presidents and directors of national banks will answer that clamor by saying, "Yes; issue more bonds on your country and we will give you more currency, and if you do not issue more bonds you will get no more currency." [Applause on the Democratic side.] The result of it is, Mr. Chairman, that by a continuing and increasing ratio you will put another force at work in our politics to pile up an incalculable debt on the people of the United States.

It is true that by an increase in the gold production of the world, bringing it up now to some $300,000,000 a year, together with other favoring causes, we have had increased prosperity. But, Mr. Chairman, no man can give us any assurance that the future years will continue to give us this increased production of gold. We must have it in order to keep the standard of measure at a proper and equitable ratio between the debtor and the creditor. But this whole financial legislation is based upon the hope, with no assurance for the realization of that hope, that the gold production of the world will increase in similar proportion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLEMING. I have not occupied any time in this debate previously, and I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, by this bill four hundred and eighty-two millions of silver money, capable now of being used as money of final redemption, are to be converted into four hundred and eighty-two millions of promises to pay in gold money. That such legislation will increase the value of the gold dollar can not be doubted. It is just as true as that effect follows after cause.

How much that dollar is to be increased in value I do not know. No man can compute it with mathematical accuracy, but that there will be an increase no man can deny. This whole financial question is a matter of deepest concern between the debtor and the creditor in their relations under the obligations of time contracts. There is not a debtor in this country, from one end to the other, who is not financially interested in the operations and the result of this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, passing over all private debts, passing over all private corporation bonds and municipal bonds and State bonds, let us come to the one single item of the national indebtedness of the United States. That indebtedness is now, in round numbers, $1,000,000,000. By the passage of this bill you inevitably increase the burden of this debt upon the people of the United States. How much that unearned and unpromised increment is going to be no man can accurately compute, but that increased burden, whatever it may be, is going to fall upon the shoulders of the people. Yet we can get a side light upon it.

When Mr. Cleveland proposed to issue only $60,000,000 worth of bonds, he was offered a price equivalent to a premium of about $16,000,000 on the $60,000,000, if he would write "gold" in the face of the evidence of indebtedness. That is about 25 per cent. Now, gentlemen, if conditions have changed and you think it will not be worth 25 per cent now, will you be willing to fix it at 12½ per cent? And if you think 12½ is too much, will you not fix it at 10 per cent?

On a basis of 10 per cent on our $1,000,000,000 indebtedness, you are putting an increased debt of $100,000,000 on the backs of the people of this country for which you are giving them no consideration whatever. When the President signs his name to this bill, by those few strokes of his pen he will add at least $100,000,000 to the burden of the people. I ask you upon what principle of law or justice or equity or morals you make such an imposition upon them?

That would be bad enough, Mr. Chairman, to be done in any country with an equal and just system of taxation; but what I want to emphasize is the peculiar and the cruel injustice that is involved in it when you consider the peculiar tax system of the United States, for you do not propose to take this money—this $100,000,000—through taxes out of the wealth of the country. If that were your purpose you might excuse yourselves by saying, "Why, it is not so bad after all. We tax the wealth of the country. We take the money out of one pocket of wealth and put it into the other pocket of wealth." But, gentlemen, you have got to consider that the Federal revenues are not based on wealth, but are taken from the people as consumers in proportion to their consumption. When you consider that you can not fail to see the crying injustice that follows this bill.

Federal taxes are not proportioned according to wealth. Two persons having the same average personal expenditure for food, clothing, shelter, etc., pay the same tribute under our tax system for the support of the Federal Government. That is true, though one person has a balance of a million dollars to his credit and the other has not a cent beyond his actual expenditures.

By this bill you establish another conduit by which and through which the small earnings of the many are to be silently but effectually transferred to the pockets of the few. To the principal and interest of these bonds the holders are justly entitled, but to that unearned and unpromised increment they have no right or title in law or morals.

In no other civilized nation in the world could such a bill work so great an injustice, for the simple reason that there is no other civilized nation that does not compel its wealth to contribute to its revenues either by a direct tax or a tax on incomes.

But the Republican party that now champions this bill is the party that fought the income tax, and under whose powerful influence the judicial decisions of a century were overturned and the income tax declared unconstitutional. Well might justice demand that this bill be halted in its progress until the law has been altered so as to make the wealth of the country bear its due share of this new burden.

This bill you, gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, may think will knock the props from under the silver plank of the Chicago platform, but it will only strengthen the supports of that other plank demanding an income tax. Every time you turn this financial screw on the people you bring nearer the day when national wealth shall be made to pay its share of national burdens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hands the official report of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas made yesterday, from which I find that I was not warranted in saying that according to the gentleman's version the Democratic party was now considering the question of whether it ought to disband or not. I will read from his remarks, Mr. Chairman. He says:

If you imagine that this season of prosperity, which is due to causes wholly apart from politics, will destroy the Democratic party, you deceive yourselves. It has outlived panics under its own Administration; it has outlived prosperous years when its enemies administered the Government.

I cordially indorse both of those statements.

It has outlived the rage and fury of a civil war and has survived the cruel and horrible days of reconstruction times, and it will survive the taunts and jeers with which you now assail it. Ah, gentlemen, I am still a young man, and yet in my life I have seen it solemnly proposed to disband the Democratic party. In 1872 or 1873 the Democrats of my native State, as loyal and as devoted as ever cherished the immortal principles of Thomas Jefferson, had reached a point where they were ready to despair and yield. I saw a convention called in Mississippi to consider the advisability of disorganizing the Democratic party.

But there and everywhere there was a small and devoted band, in whose hearts the divine fire of the old Democracy was still burning, and with a tongue of flame and a voice of prophecy they protested against the abandonment of our time-honored and undying organization. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Their wisdom prevailed. That convention adjourned, and instead of sending abroad the gospel of despair, they sent a message of hope and courage that still animates the splendid men of that great Common wealth. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, not alone in Mississippi, but in other State conventions, the Democratic party met in 1872 and considered the question of the disorganization of the Democratic party. In the State of Iowa, as you will remember, the Democratic party met in convention and formally disbanded the party, the chairman of that convention stating that the Democratic party was "dead, rotten, and buried." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, I did not know, Mr. Chairman, but what the Democracy of to-day had taken in the situation. I did not know but that in the midst of its discouragement that organization, in the midst of this splendid prosperity which they prophesied never could come unless Democracy was in the saddle, the Democratic party were ready to see the error of their ways, disband the organization, bury the dead past out of sight, organize again on a new basis, and try to find some principle that would interest the people of this country, and start out with a new argument.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I wish the gentleman would not interrupt me now. Feeling this, Mr. Chairman, and having observed in this debate a lack of courage on the part of the Democracy to stand up for their principles of 1896, a lack of courage to declare for the silver coinage, the unlimited coinage of silver, or what they term the "double standard," which was really nothing but a single silver standard for this country, I believed that they were despondent, and when I heard the words of the gentleman from Texas it was no wonder that I thought they were actually talking now about disbanding the Democratic party.

But it seems, Mr. Chairman, that I gave them credit for too much good sense and good judgment. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They do not propose to do anything of the sort, and therefore my condolence was ill-advised and ill-timed, and my fear that we were going to lose them and that the Democratic party was going to drop out of sight was not based upon the words of the gentleman from Texas.

I congratulate the Republican party, I congratulate the country, that as long as we are to have an opposition party in this country it is to be under the organization of the Democratic party, even if the Populists have captured the organization, have instilled into their platform the principles of the Populistic party, and that we are still to meet the ever-undying Democracy by name, whatever their principles may be and however they may depart from the old time-honored principles of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I ought to congratulate the Republican party that they are to have a floor leader who, after having been compelled to admit that he had misrepresented the statement of a member of the House, then seeks to escape the consequences of his misconduct by a malignant and contemptible partisan speech. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I was not compelled to make any withdrawal on this floor. I did it as a matter of courtesy to the gentleman from Texas, because he does not seem capable of appreciating a pleasantry in debate, and takes everything as serious; thinking, perhaps, that words of mine might have some effect in the State of Texas upon a certain contest which is now being made there.

I have no apologies to make for my speech; I have no apologies to make for what I said yesterday. I was willing to let it stand on the record of the gentleman's speech and my own. I simply made this statement this morning, and gave the gentleman and the House the full benefit of every word he said from the reporter's minutes, as a matter of good-natured admission toward the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I had imagined that when any gentleman found himself mistaken he was compelled by his own sense of decency to correct his error. I desire simply to say that my misunderstanding with the gentleman from New York was this—although a service of eight years with him ought to have taught me before—that he is never so serious as when he tries to be funny, and never so funny as when he tries to be serious. [Great laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, as I listened a short time ago to my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] I was reminded of a character in Shakespeare of whom it was said, "He came splitting the air with sound," and as he proceeded I was further reminded of a friend of mine in my old town in "Egypt." This young man was given to making political speeches, and one day he went out into a little country village where among his auditors was an old leader of his party whose good opinion he most highly desired. After the young man had made the very best speech that was possible for him to make, he listened for some applause or encomiums or congratulations from the good old Colonel, but he said nothing. After a while the young man edged up to him and said, "Colonel, what do you think of my speech?" "Well, young man, I tell you, sir, you have a magnificent voice." "Oh, thank you, Colonel." "And, sir, you have a grand form." "Oh, I am very much pleased, Colonel." "And, sir, your gestures are of the finest." "Oh, you flatter me, Colonel." "And, by Gad, sir, if you had some ideas you would be a match for any of us." [Laughter.] And so I thought if the gentleman from Missouri had some ideas he would be a match for anybody. I know, however, that my friend from Missouri is not always thus.

Now, gentlemen, I have learned another thing during this debate. There is one fact to which that side of the House and this side of the House will agree, and that is that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is loaded. I have been very much amused at my friends on this side who have been so frequently meeting themselves in their crooked walk on the silver question. It teaches me that I ought to be very careful what I put in the RECORD, because in the future it may come up to confront me. I thought that, as those of my friends on this side and that side were trying to evade or explain what they said a few years ago, discretion was the better part of valor; and they should say they did not know then what they were talking about. We on this side learn as the years go by; you on that side can, but you will not.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] warned the Western members the other day to beware of an indignant constituency after we vote for this bill.

He need not worry about us. We will take care of ourselves. I come from a Western State, the grand State of Washington, and I want to remind him and our friends on this side that we have had another election since 1896. You seem to forget the elections in 1898. The Republicans in the State of Washington took advanced ground. They went beyond the St. Louis platform. In our State platform we declared that "we are in favor of the gold standard and opposed to the free coinage of silver;" and, my friends, on that platform my colleague and myself were elected by a majority of nearly 4,000, overcoming a Democratic majority of 13,000 votes in 1896. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I want to say to my Democratic friends that in 1900 the whole Pacific coast will be for William McKinley by an enormous majority. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] I was very much amused when one of our friends from New York closed his speech with the peroration that he joined hands with the Democrats of the Pacific; for, when you look over the Pacific coast, you find only one solitary Democrat in this body, and I do not think he will be sent back in 1900. Let me remind you of this fact, that from the Pacific coast you have your majority on this side of the House—from Washington and California—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thank the gentleman for this courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made that the time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The States of Washington, California, and South Dakota have furnished us with our majority on this floor, or the State of Washington and the State of Kansas have furnished us with our majority upon this floor, by replacing Democrats with Republicans. I have said all that I really desired to say in this debate. My people know where I stand and have no time to read a rehash of what they heard in 1898. In the balance of the time so kindly given me I will call your attention, however, to a few statements made during this debate. Our friends on the other side tell us that we said two years ago, or four years ago, that we wanted less money in the country. Gentlemen, we did not tell you that. We told you that we were in favor of a policy that meant the greatest use of the greatest amount of money. We said that your policy of free silver was nothing more than silver monometallism, and that we believed in a policy that would use not only gold, but that would also use the greatest amount of silver. Secretary Carlisle never made a truer statement than when he said that there is not a silver-standard country in the world that uses gold, and that there is not a gold-standard country in the world but that uses millions and hundreds of millions of silver. Why, gentlemen, we believe in practical bimetallicism.

We believe in a bimetallicism that means the use as money of both sorts of metals, instead of the use of one kind of money that means the use of only one metal. Your policy meant and means monometallism. Your claim of being bimetallicists is contradicted by all history and is a sham.

Oh, but you say, Providence has helped us out. Oh, well, my friends, we are willing to admit that, and I want to say that I am going to stand by the party that Providence stands by [applause on the Republican side], and I will say to my friends on the other side, if you will get a little closer to Providence and a little further away from William J. Bryan, you will come out a great deal better in the end. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

But you come around now to just exactly what we told you in 1896. We told our people in our State that it was the law of supply and demand that regulated these things. You have been confronted by the record which shows that you said nothing but free silver would do it, and that is what you said in our State, and you got the people to believe it. You rested your whole case upon free silver. It and it alone was the sole panacea for all the ills of life. The logic of events has overcome your logic, and you now rely on the law of supply and demand. I met one old fellow and we were talking about the prices of articles and I told him that it was regulated by the law of supply and demand. He said, "Oh, is there such a law as that?" I said, "Why, certainly there is." "Well," said he, "when we get into power we will repeal that law." [Laughter.]

I am glad that that is one law you can not repeal even if you should come into power. And we did say then, and we do say now, that that law of supply and demand regulates these things, and that the bimetallicism that we are in favor of, the use of gold with hundreds of millions of silver along with it, will bring and keep a permanent prosperity in this country more surely than free silver at 16 to 1. But you say we have prosperity "slightly." Some of you admit this; some of you do not even go that far. Some of you say we have it in spots, and I heard my Adonis-formed, leonine-locked, and classic-faced friend from Tennessee state that in his district there was prosperity, but that all around the country there was no prosperity.

I would ask my friend to withdraw his eyes from the patrid spots of adversity that are only in his own mind's eye, and look upon the prosperity that is round about him, and then we will find, as it enters into his soul, that there will be such a reflection of the joy within from that classic-featured face that he will appear to this House as the evanescent essence of a delightful dream. You say even if we have prosperity that it has been brought about by the Klondike, war with Spain, and famine in India. Prosperity began in one State before any of these things happened. When it first began you blamed HANNA for it. It lasted too long, and you had to find other reasons. No, gentlemen, confidence was restored. This brought money from its hiding places. It began to work, to circulate, and the result is our prosperity. We do not deny that these other causes have an effect in this great result, however.

Yes, my friends, we have prosperity. I am glad you have admitted it; I am glad you have confessed it. But you say it will not continue. Always a song of distrust and discouragement; always a song that leads to lack of confidence. You would make a well man sick. [Laughter and applause.] Oh, my friends on that side of the House, just come with us a while. [Laughter and applause.] Just come along with us and look upon the bright side of life just a little while. It will do you good; you will feel better; you will sleep better to-night. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Chairman, if it is as hard for an Iowa farmer or day laborer to obtain money during these days of "newspaper prosperity" as it is for a newly elected member to get recognition and time in which to express his views on questions of national import, I am not surprised at the gentleman from that State [Mr. DOLLIVER] confessing the fact in his speech at the opening of this debate that when he paid the interest this year on his indebtedness, which he incurred during President Harrison's Administration, he found himself, in the language of the street urchin, "financially busted."

It will be remembered, too, that the gentleman made this confession while expounding on the glories of the present Republican prosperity, which he had been enjoying for the three past years.

The learned gentleman from Iowa, like all those on that side of the House following him in this discussion, has attempted to justify the passing of this bill on account of the great wave of prosperity now passing over this country.

The gentleman painted in glowing terms the prosperous condition of his State, especially how every man in the State was constantly employed, in consequence of which he was unable to employ help the past season and had his own barn to build.

This may sound encouraging to the Republicans and a few galvanized Democrats of the East, but to us who live West it only carries the weight true conditions warrant.

Illinois is a sister State to Iowa—has the same climate, soil, people, and industries—and it can only be expected that like conditions exist, and I believe they do.

Now let me tell you what the conditions of Illinois are. She is controlled by a Republican governor and State legislature. In its wisdom the legislature last session, to protect the unemployed laborers of the State, passed a law creating a free State employment bureau, which went into effect July 1.

Since that time there has been nearly 20,000 applications made to that bureau to obtain employment, one-fifth of whom were turned away unable to secure it. Strange, is it not, with so much prosperity, a Republican legislature should see fit to establish a free employment bureau in the great State of Illinois?

Strange, is it not, that this bureau has only been in operation five months and 20,000 applications have been made to it to get employment?

Stranger still, is it not, that one-fifth of these were turned away empty handed?

I would advise the gentleman from Iowa when he desires to build another barn to inform the Illinois State bureau of labor. I would advise the gentleman at the same time to assure the bureau that he has the money with which to pay the workmen, or at least that his credit is good; on either of which conditions I doubt seriously if the gentleman would have to leave his own State to get help.

The old story of the country schoolhouse debating society is certainly applicable here and now. Since coming upon the floor of this House and witnessing the automatic, acrobatic antics of the learned gentlemen on the other side in their desperate efforts to avoid discussing the subject-matter of this most infamous measure, I now have the most profound respect for the country schoolhouse debater who invariably stuck to the text.

I have the first gentleman on that side of the House yet to see or hear take up this measure and attempt to defend it section by section.

The first section of this bill provides that the standard of value shall, as now, be the dollar and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle, thus committing the finance of the country to the single gold standard, making it the only basic money for all time to come. Not but what such a state of affairs has existed since 1873, and most certainly since 1890; yet, to comply with the demands of the bankers and brokers of the country they desire to make assurance doubly sure by the passing of this bill. If for no other reason, I should be against this obnoxious bill on this account.

If I had never had convictions of my own on the question of the needs of this country demanding more than one kind of basic money, I could go to the pages of history made by leading Republicans and find ample evidence to convert any unbiased Republican to the iniquity of this measure.

In order to show the position of the Republican party no later than 1888, I quote from the financial plank of the Republican national platform of that year:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

Also, in 1892, the Republican platform declared:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as money.

No later than 1890 President McKinley declared on the floor of this House:

I am for the largest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it; I would give it equal credit and honor with gold; I would make no discrimination; I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

This was before Mr. McKinley received new light on the financial question. This was when he was only a poor Congressman, honest to his constituency. It was before the Republican party was mortgaged to the banks, corporations, and bondholders of the country.

This was before the negotiation was completed between the Republican party and the money power that a money panic should be brought upon the people.

The money panic of 1894, 1895, and 1896 was described by Mr. DOLLIVER of Iowa as having been brought about by the lack of confidence of the money owners of the country in the Democratic Administration. Yet at the same time the learned gentleman lauds Mr. Cleveland, who was then President of the United States, on account of his sound ideas on the money question.

The same law was on the statutes then that exists to-day. If Mr. Cleveland was safe on the money question and the law was the same that controls the present Administration, what reasonable explanation can you make for the panic of 1893, 1894, and 1895, and the alleged prosperity of 1899? The only attempted explanation was lack of confidence in the Democratic Administration. Who maintained this lack of confidence? It is claimed by the gentleman that it was the money owners and banks, corporations, etc., and in consequence of this lack of confidence they drew in all outstanding money from circulation, producing a money panic. Just so soon as Mr. McKinley was elected, this money was again dumped back on the banking counters and rushed into circulation.

There is a better explanation than that of a lack of confidence in Cleveland's Administration. In the light of all that has occurred since, including this present designing measure, it is more in keeping with reason that there was a compact entered into by the leaders of the Republican party and the banking corporations and money-changers of the country that this panic should be brought on to discredit the Cleveland Administration and restore the Republicans to power, which was done; and the enactment of this bill into law is the final foreclosure proceedings.

You are forever bound to do the bidding of the money power in order to maintain this confidence. You forge your own chains. The position you occupy before the people is not one to be envied. We are ready to go before the people with you on this issue.

By the second section of this bill you make "all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, and all other obligations, public and private, payable in gold coin."

This bill strikes out the word "coin" and writes in its place the word "gold." All our Government obligations were written "payable in coin," and the word "coin" is written in all our bonds. It was understood when these bonds were sold that they were to be redeemed in either gold or silver.

This little change in one word will put millions in the pockets of the bondholders.

The prime reason for the Democratic party's hatred of Grover Cleveland to this day grew out of his special message to Congress, asking them to substitute the word "gold" instead of "coin" in the bonds he was compelled to issue during his second Administration, telling them that the bonds would sell for fourteen to sixteen millions more if they would only do so.

You Republicans were with the Democrats then in refusing to do so. Now, since the bonds were sold on a basis of being payable in "coin" for a sum of fourteen to sixteen millions less than they might have done had the word "gold" been substituted, you gentlemen now propose to write the word "gold" in the place of "coin" in those identical bonds, thereby enhancing the value of those bonds more than sixteen millions to-day in favor of the bondholders.

Why should they not have confidence in you? Why should they not contribute largely to your campaign fund? It is a fraudulent transaction on its face against the taxpayers. It is one of your practical ways of producing prosperity. Ask your constituents which one of them has prospered by this transaction.

This small bond issue by the Cleveland Administration is but a drop in the bucket to the millions you give to the holders of other outstanding obligations which were sold on a "coin" basis, but by this act you make them redeemable in "gold."

But there are other provisions in this bill even more obnoxious and more dangerous to the welfare of this country, if such a thing could be possible, than the one I have just described. In section 4 of this bill "the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue and sell, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to the maintenance of the reserve fund, bonds made payable in gold coin."

The Secretary is thus made subservient to no man. This tendency toward imperialistic one-man power, which is the sole sentiment of Republicanism to-day under the guidance of its present leaders, is the most dangerous and far-reaching feature of this bill. No such power was ever delegated to one man in all the past ages in the financial history of any country.

When asked to explain the occasion for turning the whole financial policy of our Government over to a one-man power, the answer is the inevitable stereotyped one, "On account of changed conditions."

What are the changed conditions? Is it possible that because we paid $20,000,000 for 10,000,000 of inoffensive Negrito and Malay creoles, situated on a group of lonely islands thousands of miles from the seat of Government, that we might have them to use for targets in our rifle practice, that we distrust our capability of self-government any more, and step by step the several Departments are to be turned over to the one-man power? The measure pending is the first long step in that direction. It turns over to the Secretary of the Treasury the whole financial system of the Government to control at his sweet will for the benefit of the money changers who will sit upon his right hand.

There were never two more menacing words to the property owners and industries of the country than the words "flexibility" and "contraction," especially when all power is delegated to the banks. The banks established under this law will have the power of crushing every private bank in the country and compelling every national bank as now constituted to become branch national banks under this law, provided that three comptrollers of the new division of issues in the Treasury Department, which this law establishes, will grant them the privilege to do so.

James A. Garfield said while in Congress:

Whoever controls the volume of money of any country is absolute master of all industries and commerce.

Secretary Gage says in his report:

The power of needful expansion must be intrusted to the banks.

Note the contrast: The former a statesman speaking the sentiment of his soul in behalf of the masses, the latter a hireling voicing the demands of the few.

"Flexibility," the power of "expansion" and, necessarily, of "contraction," also, must be intrusted to the banks.

The bank trust which this scheme, if enacted into law, will certainly establish will be the most gigantic of all trusts and will dominate and control every other trust in the country or, rather, by an arrangement with other trusts will dominate and control the commerce of the country, regulate the rise and fall of stocks to their own advantage, and cause a money panic whenever it subserves their own interest best.

By a contraction of currency they can reduce the values of property; and when the best securities have been gathered up by them, they will have it in their power to expand the currency and make for themselves fortunes at the expense of the unprotected public. By this bill the "greenbacks" now in circulation in the country are withdrawn and embalmed in the vaults of the Treasury, and to this extent the volume of currency will be contracted and diverted from the channels of trade.

Lincoln said:

If a government contracts a debt with a certain amount of money in circulation, and then contracts the money volume before the debt is paid, it is the most heinous crime a government can commit against the people.

This bill proposes to give the banks the power to periodically or permanently do this very thing.

The power to issue money and fix the value and the volume thereof is the highest act of sovereignty in any form of government. It is a power too sacred, too mighty for good or evil, and entirely too dangerous to be self-delegated to the banks or any special class of people.

The ordinary Republican apologizes for his change of front on the money question by saying it is on account of the sudden change of conditions. Permit me to quote the language of President McKinley in a speech he made at Toledo, Ohio, in 1891. He said:

During all of Grover Cleveland's years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored even before his inauguration to office to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards and to the end of his Administration persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce and therefore dear.

He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else. Money the master; everything else the servant. He was not thinking of the 'poor' then. He had left their 'side.' He was not standing forth in their defense.

Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money! The sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly! Was there ever more inconsistency or reckless assumption?

If you should ask President McKinley why his sudden change of front, I presume he would reply that it was a change in his "environments."

This change is great enough, but it will not be the last. It will come after the enactment of this bill into a law. I warn you, gentlemen, of the power you are creating in this bill, lest it rise in its might and crush its creators.

The next change to follow will be a revision of the golden rule. Instead of its reading, "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you," the few benefactors of this most vicious measure will have it read, "You have done unto us all that we demanded; now what we do to you will be a plenty." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, Missouri has been much in evidence in this debate, and her Representatives have been very severe on Mr. Cleveland, the only Democratic President this country has had in the last third of a century. But one gentleman from Missouri lifted up his voice in the last convention that nominated Mr. Cleveland. His name was Wallace—Hon. William H. Wallace. He delivered a speech seconding the nomination of Mr. Cleveland, voicing the sentiment of Missouri Democracy at that time. Although Mr. Wallace delivered the speech, I have a suspicion that another distinguished gentleman from that State wrote it. I will read the speech and leave the members of the House to guess who wrote it. I read from the book giving the proceedings of the national Democratic convention of 1892:

Mr. Chairman and delegates of this great convention: Men come and men go. Parties and governments rise and fall. The very stars leap from their sockets in the skies and rush on to ruin in their trackless voyage. The sun is often eclipsed, and once, we are told, it stood still. But the Democratic majority of grand old Missouri goes on forever.

No man or devil can divide it; no defeat can conquer it; no sophistry can change it; no money can buy it. It is as fixed and as resplendent in the political heavens as Venus, as warlike as Mars, as resistless as Jupiter. Roll what way it will, whether it be Know-nothingism, or Prohibition, or Farmers' Alliance, or Republicanism, it dashes against Gibraltar and gathers sea foam for its victory when it reaches the Missouri lines.

[Laughter.]

Say whatever else you will about us; let Republicans scheme and plan until their heads are gray; let the battle rage until filthy Mammon has expended his last dollar and red-plumed Lucifer has shouted himself hoarse with urging on his fiery steeds, yet never will the Democratic flag go down on Missouri soil.

[Laughter.]

We have served you so long and so faithfully that my heart is trembling and has trembled all along with the thought, seeing we have served you so faithfully, that possibly in this grand council chamber you do not wish to hear me. I wish you knew us better. Come and see us. Come all of you at once—delegate, audience, Tammany braves, and all. Come! Come!

[Laughter.]

I invite you to come to us as the disciples went forth to the world, without purse and without scrip. Come!

[Laughter.]

Twenty thousand hospitable Christian homes will receive you, and bed and board shall be as free as the song of the whip-poor-will that serenades you by night or the mocking bird that wakes you up when Aurora strews the skies with her flowers.

[Laughter.]

Gentlemen of the convention, I bear but one message from magnificent Missouri. As the prairie flower turns its face to the king of day as he mounts up into the sky, as it looks toward him, receiving from him light and warmth and strength, so, I say to you, does the Democracy of Missouri, with her loving, confiding, childlike heart, turn toward and follow Grover Cleveland. Intending, as I believe to-night, to say my last word with one joyous hope, I come in the name of Missouri to second the nomination of Grover Cleveland.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, that was the sentiment of Missouri Democracy only seven years ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, that last remark of the gentleman from Michigan "was the most unkindest cut of all." [Laughter and applause.] I wish to say, however, that I am not among the number of those who must pray forgiveness for having been one of the advocates of the nomination of the late lamented Grover Cleveland. [Renewed laughter.] It is true that at one time in our history we of Missouri were led to believe that the fat-witted candidate for the White House was a Democrat (though I never did consider him a good one), but we have long ago and a thousand times repudiated him. He is a good Republican. If you can make anything out of him take him. [Laughter.]

I have been highly entertained during this debate—in fact, I have been at times very much amused. The progress of this debate has reminded me of an Irishman who went out into a graveyard and read the inscriptions on the tombstones. Seeing one which read, "Jonathan A. Jones, born July 1, 1831; died January 1, 1891; an eminent lawyer, an honest man," and so on, he stopped and looked again. "'An eminent lawyer, an honest man!' Faith and be gosh, and the soil must be very dear when they have to bury two men in the same hole." [Laughter.]

This bill seems to be a burying hole not only for two men but for nearly every man on the Republican side of the House. One after another we have heard them stand up here and swallow their own words and repudiate the pledges of their own platform. One after another we have heard them announce that they were not to be embarrassed by any expressions of their own on former occasions. They have buried those speeches, and this bill will bury them.

In the few minutes at my command I shall content myself with a brief discussion of three propositions.

First, that the somersault of the Republican party completely demonstrates their insincerity and utter hypocrisy in dealing with the public.

Secondly, that the business activity which they now offer as an excuse for this change of front is only bogus prosperity, based on artificial and unnatural conditions, and not calculated to last.

Thirdly, that the effect of this bill will necessarily be, not only to fasten the gold standard permanently on the people, but also to turn over the whole machinery of Government finances into the hands of the national banks, and thus create a banking syndicate with absolute power to control the currency of the country and produce panics at pleasure.

These are the three fundamental propositions involved in this whole subject, and to them I invite your most candid consideration. I congratulate you, gentlemen on the other side of the House, upon having at last cast off the mask of false pretenses of friendliness to bimetalism and marched out to fight your battle in the open field; and this challenge to combat we gladly accept. We only wish you had given us this opportunity four years ago, but at that time you claimed to be the true bimetalists. Your orators and your editors asserted with vehement persistency your faith in bimetalism. Your platform of 1892 had declared that the American people by interest and tradition are bimetalists. Your platform in 1896 declared in favor of bimetalism by international agreement and pledged your party by all honest means to promote it.

Aye, your President himself had gone so far as to charge Grover

Cleveland with the unpatriotic purpose to destroy silver as money of the people, thereby making money dearer and labor cheaper; or, as he expressed it, "To make money the master and all things else the servant." In short, your loud professions in favor of bimetallicism were so persistent and prolonged as almost to deceive the very elect, and when on the rostrum and the stump, in the press and the forum, we denounced your pretensions as hypocritical, and pointed to the potent agencies then in control of your party machinery as proof that you had no such intentions of really promoting bimetallicism, your indignation rose high, and with the air of injured innocence you told us that we were demagogues appealing to prejudices, and anarchists ready to "overthrow the foundations of the Government." Now you have demonstrated that our charge was true, and the honest thousands in your party who then believed in your sincerity will now know that we were right.

And therefore, while we deplore for our country the evils which this bill must bring upon it, we thank you from a political standpoint for having verified our predictions. That it was your purpose in the beginning to acquiesce in the gold-standard policy of the bank-ridden governments of Europe is proven most conclusively by the half-hearted and perfunctory manner in which your alleged effort to promote international bimetallicism was carried on, because at the very moment when Mr. McKinley's commissioners were pretending to preach bimetallicism to representatives of the British Government in London his Secretary of the Treasury was preparing a bill to be introduced in Congress, the chief purpose of which, in his own language, was "to more thoroughly establish the gold standard," and giving it out in interviews to the press, cabled at once to the London papers, that this country did not want bimetallicism, but was going to adopt the English gold standard. And when a distinguished Senator of your own party, himself a McKinley Republican, urged Mr. McKinley to call down his Secretary of the Treasury and make an effort in good faith to carry out the pledge of the St. Louis platform, he was treated with the contempt of absolute silence. And thus was the farce enacted by this Administration early in its career, of preaching bimetallicism abroad and at the very same instant stabbing it in the back at home.

You spent $100,000 of the people's money in an ostensible effort to promote bimetallicism by international agreement, while proclaiming at the same time through the trusted representative of the Administration at home that you had no such purpose. Such a record of broken pledges is enough to make you gentlemen on the other side stand up here one after another and announce to the House and country that you have received new light; that you do not propose to be handicapped by your own promises or your own arguments made in the past. No wonder that the distinguished orator from Iowa found it necessary to make public apology on this floor for his change of front; no wonder that every one of you gentlemen should feel so embarrassed by the crookedness of your record on this question that you must needs stand up here and proclaim in advance that you are not going to be bound by words uttered even by yourselves only a few years past. It is an easy matter for gentlemen to say that they have discovered new light and will not be embarrassed by this confession of stupidity in the past.

But I warn you that this "plea of confession and avoidance" will not shield you and your party from the scorn and contempt of honest men who believe in consistency, of those who believe that truth to-day will be truth to-morrow; those who despise a timeserver in politics and a pretender in the science of government. You need not suppose that the great American public can be whistled out of a conviction as quickly as you can be shuffled out of your shoes. You are to-day confronted with this dilemma: If the gold standard is a good thing, why did you spend $100,000 of the people's money trying to get rid of it? If it is a bad thing, why are you now endeavoring to enact it into law? There it is; take either horn of it you please. I impale you upon it and nail you to the wall. Let the affable and eloquent gentleman from Iowa who stood here on Monday and invited us to stand up at his beck and call, on a much-confused and half-stated proposition, now face the music. Let him stand in his place and say which horn of this dilemma he proposes to hang himself on; and before I get through, if my time does not expire too soon, I will also give him a chance to stand upon his own proposition, when fairly stated.

I will go a step further, and invite the gentleman from Iowa, or any other gentleman, to rise in his place and answer whether or not this Administration has made any honest and persistent effort to secure international bimetallicism, according to its platform pledge. The whole country knows that you have not, and your loud boast now that you do not intend to be bound by that pledge, nor even by your own individual utterances, on the stump and here in this Hall, we cheerfully accept as evidence and as advertisement to the world that no pledge that you can make is hereafter to be considered binding. While for our country's sake we deplore the fact that a great political party has become so reckless, so unscrupulous, that its proclamations and its promises can only excite the ridicule and contempt of honest citizens, at the same time, from a party standpoint, we thank you again for having given this consummate demonstration of your faithless pretenses and the perfidious hypocrisy of Republican platforms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VANDIVER. I should like to have permission to occupy five minutes' more time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made that by unanimous consent the gentleman be permitted to continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VANDIVER. I thank you, gentlemen.

And now to the second proposition—your excuse for this acrobatic and tragic performance. You tell us that the wonderful activity in business is such a change from the conditions which existed in 1896 that it demonstrates to your satisfaction the wisdom of maintaining the gold standard. I tell you frankly that no man who is at the same time honest, intelligent, and unprejudiced can survey the field of present conditions and find in them any confirmation of your claim that it is due to the gold standard. The prosperity that exists is mainly the prosperity of trusts, syndicates, corporations, and protected manufactures. It is not the prosperity of the masses.

From 1886 to 1896 the wages of labor had gone down from $1.25 to 85 and 90 cents per day, which may be considered the low-water mark for all the history of this country. When now they have been increased to $1, you herald it abroad as a period of immense prosperity for the laborer, forgetting that in no other period of our history for more than forty years has the average daily wage of the man who makes his living in the sweat of his brow been less than $1.25 per day. Likewise comparing 50-cent wheat in 1896 with 60-cent wheat now, $4 pork now with $3.50 pork then, and 44-cent cattle now with 4-cent cattle then, you cry great prosperity for the farmer, expecting him to forget the time when he sold cattle and hogs at 10 cents and wheat at $1.50. Furthermore, he must now pay $24 per thousand, instead of $16, for lumber if he wishes to build a house (and all other material for it in the same proportion), and an increase of 200 per cent in the cost of nails and barbed wire if he wishes to build a fence; and gets only 15 pounds of sugar for his dollar instead of 20 pounds; in short, an increase of 10 or 15 per cent in wages and farm products, with an increase of from 40 to 200 per cent in everything that the farmer and laborer must buy, is the prosperity which you ask us to shout for.

It is mainly, I say, the prosperity of trusts and corporations.

But, for the sake of argument, let us admit that prosperity has come and that it is general. The question for the statesman to ask himself is this: How can it be made more general and lasting? Let us not be deceived by false appearances. We all rejoice that business is better than it was; that the panic, like all other panics, had to have an end. But did your legislation bring it to an end? You may try to persuade your unthinking constituents that your tariff bill did it; but you can not persuade yourselves. You know better. You know that it was eighteen months after the election of Mr. McKinley before you even claimed yourselves to discover this revival of business.

Be it remembered that the decline in business and prices began about the middle of Harrison's Administration, lasted all through Cleveland's and well into the middle of McKinley's—the worst of it coming in the last year of Cleveland's term and the first year of McKinley's. The panic of 1893 lasted longer than the panic of 1873. Do you claim credit for bringing it to an end? You might as well claim credit for the rain and the sunshine; and I believe you would do so if you thought the people were as ignorant of the laws of nature as they are of the effects of legislation. I undertake to say that better times have come in spite of your legislation and that your proposed legislation, instead of prolonging the period of prosperity, will cut it short.

It is my candid belief that the causes which have produced the revival of business and the rise of prices may all be included under three heads.

First, the most prolonged and widespread famine ever known in India, affecting 50,000,000 people in 1896 and 1897, created unusual demand for our agricultural products, and that famine has been followed by another, which is still raging and which affects over 30,000,000 people. These, together with short crops in our own country, would naturally affect prices in a very marked degree, as our products, though not going to India directly, must go to other countries that had been dependent upon India. India had supplied Europe with wheat, but her famine and distress gave us that market.

Secondly, The war with Spain created an immense and sudden demand for great quantities of our products, both of farm and factory. And the $375,000,000 for the Spanish war went quickly into circulation, as also the $100,000,000 already spent on the Philippine war. Besides this, the British-Boer war has quickened the markets of Europe as well as our own. It is well known that war breeds extravagance of every kind, and higher prices always follow. But what of that theory of government finance which must depend upon war and famine to bring prosperity? It is a Republican theory, and that is the worst I can say for it.

Thirdly, I submit your own claim that $385,000,000 have been added to the circulating medium. Was it done by act of Congress or the President? You know that this is the very first bill that has been introduced in this House on the currency question since the election of McKinley.

You know that your party had not made any effort to increase the amount of money in circulation, but that in spite of you and without your help or encouragement vast quantities of gold have been brought out of the mines, and this has greatly helped to raise the embargo on business and advance the general level of prices. We told you in 1896 that more money was needed, and we proposed to coin both gold and silver. You said there was money enough. Now you boast that in three years $385,000,000 have been added to our circulation. At that time the total annual output of the gold mines of the world was but $200,000,000. This year it is $300,000,000 or more. Now, whatever of general prosperity prevails or is likely to prevail or rest on a permanent basis is due to this permanent addition to our stock of gold. The other causes are transitory and can not last. In short, an addition of $100,000,000 a year to our stock of primary money has already raised the general level of prices from 10 to 12 per cent and quickened the pulse of business to a proportionate degree. If this be true, then a like increase by adding $100,000,000 of silver as money of full legal-tender value or primary redemption money would produce a like result. Your argument, then, demonstrates the truth of the quantitative theory of money, and our argument for the free coinage of gold and silver both is strengthened rather than weakened by the facts of recent history.

The brilliant and eloquent gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] on Monday last read an extract from one of Bryan's speeches declaring that the fall of prices was due to a contraction of the currency, and predicting still further decline if the gold standard should be made permanent, and then with great gusto and monumental gall—aye, with the most colossal conceit—straightened himself up with an air of exalted satisfaction in the fullness and profundity of his logic and challenged any Democrat on the floor to rise in his place and say whether or not, in view of the recent rise in prices, Mr. Bryan knew anything about the subject he was discussing. Now, then, let me state the proposition as Mr. Bryan meant it, and as all bimetalists have presented it. It is this: That so long as the quantity of primary or redemption money continues to fall or fails to keep pace with the growth of population and business, the general tendency of prices is downward.

In testing the proof of this general proposition no reasonable man, especially no statesman who values his reputation for fairness and breadth of thought, will take the prices of a few commodities for a short period of time, or even of all commodities for a short space of time. Every intelligent man knows that particular conditions may arise that will temporarily arrest the general tendency, just as short eddies may occur in the channel of a great stream, or even the whole stream be temporarily turned backward upon its course by artificial obstructions in its path. But the candid reasoner, seeking for truth rather than party advantage, will look backward over a long period of years and make his comparisons and find his averages for the prices of many commodities under many varying conditions.

Now, I hold in my hand a table of prices of 45 different articles of common consumption, including wheat, corn, oats, beef, pork, tea, coffee, sugar, iron, copper, lead, coal, cotton, wool, and other things in most general use, for every year, averaged up from the prices of every day, during the past twenty-five years. This table was prepared not by a politician nor by a statesman; not by an advocate of any theory; but by a man whose business it has been for many years simply to collect the facts, the actual figures from the market reports in the city of London, the great commercial center of the world, which practically may be said to fix the prices of every other market in the world. These are the tables prepared by the great London statistician, the most reliable anywhere in the world, the great London statistician Sauerbeck. Taking the average of these 45 articles of commerce, beginning twenty-five years back, in 1873, taking that date as the point of departure, and assuming the average of the whole 45 for that year as the unit of comparison, and hence marking that as 100 in the table, the list runs down to 92, 85, and so on down to 54, the lowest point in the whole scale, which occurred in 1896. There are but two breaks in the descending scale, one beginning in 1888, when the average rose from 61 to 63 and then 65, and then falling again, it comes down to 54, and has since risen to 56.8.

Mr. Sauerbeck's index numbers, to which is added the annual average price of silver in London and to which is added index numbers of the same commodities, taking as their base the average prices of 1873, and a table showing the increase of the purchasing power of a dollar, taking the average prices of 1873 as the base.

Year.	Sauerbeck's index numbers of 45 principal commodities, taking average price of 1867-1877 as their base = 100.	Index numbers of same 45 principal commodities, taking the average price of 1873 as their base = 100.	Table showing increase of purchasing power of a dollar, taking the average prices of 1873 as the base = 100.	Sauerbeck's index numbers of silver, taking the price 1867-1877 of 60.84¢ = 100. Now, because the unforeseen events of famine and war, aided by the unforeseen enlargement of the gold output in Montana, Dakota, Alaska, South America, and South Africa—because, I say, these unforeseen events have temporarily arrested the decline in prices and brought them up to about 57 per cent of what they were twenty-five years ago, and only 3 per cent above what they were three years ago, the gentleman from Iowa, availing himself of a little technicality in the wording of the argument of the great champion of free silver, narrows it down to a particular time and boastfully proclaims that he has overthrown the whole logic of twenty-five years of history. In short, this magnificent gentleman with utter abandon and chivalrous courage, more reckless even than his logic, jumps out into an eddy current, utterly incapable of sounding the depths beneath him, unable to see his length ahead of him, and unwilling to look behind him, but, mounted on a raft, shouts to the world that the Mississippi River is flowing north instead of south.

Now, I invite him, with Sauerbeck's tables before his eyes, to stand up before this House and recant the miserable makeshift of logic which he attempted on Monday to palm off on us. Let him rise in his place, if he dares, and deny the truth of Mr. Bryan's fundamental proposition, and when he does so he must also retract his own proud boast that $385,000,000 added to our circulation is the cause of our prosperity. Here again let him choose which horn of the dilemma he pleases. Either Bryan's fundamental proposition is true, or the much boasted addition to our stock of gold is a calamity. Let him admit the truth of Bryan's proposition or stop the coinage of this calamity.

But why this legislation now to establish a gold standard by law? Gentlemen, the Dingley tariff pays the debt of the Republican party to the manufacturers and protected trusts. The war-revenue bill provided the means of paying their debt to the Government contractors and provided holes for the surplus pegs. And now this bill is intended to pay another debt. What is it? We are informed by several distinguished gentlemen, one of them from Iowa, and also by the distinguished veteran statesman from Ohio—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To which gentleman from Ohio do you refer?

Mr. VANDIVER. Not being permitted under the rules of the House to call gentlemen by name, I will designate him as the gentleman from Ohio who looks like Santa Claus and talks like Satan. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] We are gravely informed by these gentlemen that this Republican House is to redeem a pledge. Wonderful thing! They have repudiated the pledge on which they were elected, but they are to redeem a secret pledge made to the Gold Democrats. In 1896, Mr. Chairman, there were 7,000,000 people in this country who voted for William McKinley on a platform of international bimetalism; six and a half millions voted for the matchless champion of the people, William J. Bryan, on a platform of independent bimetalism. There were less than one-eighth of a million, I think it was, who voted the Palmer and Buckner ticket for a gold standard.

Now, the seven million and the six and a half million of men are all expected to bow the knee to Baal while you pay your debt to the one-eighth of a million who voted the Palmer and Buckner ticket. We are informed that you are to redeem a pledge made to them; and so the Gold Democrat, now bloated with the price of his perfidy, sits mounted, booted, and spurred upon the G. O. P., not as an elephant but as an ass, and rides him down the highway, plunging headlong over the precipice to destruction; and as we witness this spectacle we shout our last farewell, "Sic itur ad hades." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to enter my protest against the most monstrous of all the iniquitous provisions of this bill—that relating to bonds and banks. I had hoped to be able to offer an amendment, and at least to secure a vote on a proposition to tax the holdings of the bondholder, as we do the homes of the farmer, the laborer, and the mechanic. But under the ironclad rule which you have adopted for the passage of this bill you preclude the possibility of amending it, and have even provided against putting yourselves on record by a yea-and-nay vote on such an amendment. Your audacity is great, but you dare not go before the country with your record on a direct vote against requiring the bondholder to bear his proportion of the burden of government, and therefore you have deliberately and arbitrarily refused to allow such a proposition to be voted on. But you can notescape the responsibility for this bill allowing no tax to be levied upon a Government bond, and even reducing the small tax which has heretofore been levied upon national banks merely for the purpose of defraying the office and clerical expenses connected with the issuance of bank notes. But, further than this, you can not escape the record of that vote which originally exempted the Government bonds from taxation, because when this very amendment authorizing the taxation of Government bonds was originally submitted to Congress 63 Democrats in this House voted in favor of it and not one against it, while 77 Republicans voted against it and thus defeated it.

Now, sir, if any reason can be shown why this discrimination should be made in favor of the bondholder, exempting him from taxation, while the heavy hands of the taxgatherer rest with crushing weight upon every other citizen, why have you not the courage to produce that reason and justify yourselves before the country. I believe you have not undertaken the task, because no reason can be given.

But your bill goes still further. It will practically withdraw the greenbacks from circulation and turn over to the national banks the whole business of issuing credit money, thus putting almost the entire volume of currency of the country under the control of a few great moneyed corporations, which can inflate the currency or contract it at their pleasure, thus completely governing the markets and the prices of all the products of labor, producing panics at their pleasure and gradually absorbing the wealth of the country.

Such a complete surrender to the money power has never been made by any party in this country, even in times of dire calamity. Neither the extraordinary emergencies of war nor the exigencies of party politics have ever brought the Government so completely down upon its knees before the money kings of the world as this piece of legislation now proposes to do.

But, sir, the crowning infamy of this disgraceful proceeding is that which proposes to give the Secretary of the Treasury absolute power, without having to come to Congress and getting the consent of the people, to issue bonds where his judgment or his pleasure may so decree. Another step in the direction of imperialism! Up to this time in our history Congress has reserved to itself the right to determine when there should be a new issue of bonds. It has also generally reserved to itself the authority to increase the standing Army, but in the last session of Congress you passed a bill through this House, which fortunately was defeated in the Senate, giving the President authority to increase the standing Army to 100,000 men; and now you are to pass another authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, who, of course, is to be the creature of the President, to issue bonds at his pleasure. Is anything more needed to turn this Government into an empire? Only one more step, and that is to make the temporary organization permanent, and proclaim William of Canton emperor for life.

Against this policy, sir, against all of this reckless and shameful surrender of the Republican party to the gold syndicate, the trust magnates, and the imperial bosses, we erect the standard of the people, and proclaim the Chicago platform as the embodiment of the wisdom and patriotism of the great masses of the American people. That platform was a second Declaration of Independence, and it will be reaffirmed without abatement in the next Democratic convention. Its declaration in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 will offer some hope for a continuous enlargement of the financial basis, on which all permanent prosperity must rest. Its candid declaration against the encroachment of the Federal courts will be strengthened by a further and much stronger declaration against the dangerous and diabolical encroachment of the trusts upon the business and prosperity of the private citizen, and the doctrine that "all men are born free and equal," that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," will again kindle the flame of human liberty and proclaim to all the world that this is still to be a republic and not an empire, a friend and not a foe of other peoples struggling to establish republican governments in other quarters of the globe. This shall be our slogan, and no man whose faith is weak in these great principles of our party should be trusted with its leadership, either in the nation or any Congressional district in the Union. With these principles emblazoned on our banner, and under the matchless leadership and magic name of William J. Bryan, of Nebraska, we will again give you battle, confident in the ultimate triumph of truth over falsehood and justice and wisdom over prejudice and ignorance.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have been surprised in many directions during this debate, and I am a little provoked now with some of the remarks I have heard this morning from my respected friend from Missouri. From a very early period in the history of Kansas our friends in Missouri have been in the habit of saying and doing things that were aggravating to us in Kansas. One of the gentlemen this morning quoted us as having been in the column that added Democratic gains in the last election. I want to correct him far enough to say that in the last election we returned to this House six Republican members of Congress in place of six Populist members in the Fifty-fifth Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was in the election before the last. Now, in the election of 1899, I ask you if the Republicans of Kansas did not lose twice as many counties as in 1898?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I will state that the Republicans in the election of 1899 did not lose twice as many counties as in 1898. I am not able to give the exact figures, but I think the Republicans in Kansas in 1899 made a gain of 35 per cent in the number of counties they carried over the number of counties carried in 1898. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I want to go back far enough to say that we have been accused of all kinds of motives in the support of this bill, and some of us have had to correct our records. It is some satisfaction that the delegation from Kansas does not have to correct its record on this question.

In the year 1894 we campaigned our districts and told our people plainly and distinctly at that time that we were willing to vote for the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 at any time when it could be done without depreciating the value of any of our money. We told them also that we never would vote for it at any time when the necessary result would be to depreciate the value of any of our money, and it is for that reason and upon that ground that the delegation from Kansas is here to-day solidly supporting the bill that is now offered to the House. And the only answer that is offered to us is that we are doing it now to pay a corrupt political debt which in some way or other we incurred in the last national election.

One of the eloquent gentlemen from Missouri repeated that over and over again in his speech, although he must be conscious himself that it is either the merest demagoguery addressed to his constituents or that it is childish nonsense addressed to this House. The Republican party to-day represents one-half of the voters, one-half of the homes, one-half, at least, of the laborers of this nation, and it has never at any time sold itself to any corrupt influence in the nation for the purpose of injuring any portion of its ranks. The Republican party has had substantial care of the laborers of this nation for many years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOLLIVER and Mr. OVERSTREET asked unanimous consent that the time of Mr. CALDERHEAD be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. From the earliest period of its history the Republican party has had peculiar care of the labor of this country, and there never has been a time when the labor of this country trusted to the Republican party that it has been betrayed; never once. There never was a time when the patriotism of the country trusted to the Republican party that it was betrayed.

There never was a time when the business of the country trusted to the Republican party and suffered any loss by it. It was Grant, whose memory seems to be so highly honored by the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who said in his message of 1869:

Let it be distinctly understood that no repudiator of a single farthing of our public debt shall ever be recognized in public office.

And said that in response to an attempt to inflate the currency of the country. It was President Hayes, concerning whom the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] spoke in language that was discreditable to that gentleman himself, either as a man or as a member—it was Hayes who said that he vetoed the bill in 1878 for the express reason that the dollar which it provided for was worth 10 cents less than the actual dollar which was the standard of value in the country and by that process every laboring man in the country would be defrauded in the payment to him of that which was due to him.

From the hour of that message until this time the Republican party has been battling continually for a standard which means justice to the laboring man as well as justice to every man who transacts business in the country. It is true enough that if at any time it had been possible to make a double standard, in which there would have been no variation of value, the Republican party would have been ready at any time to do that thing; but the business transactions of the country and the current history of the world have been a course of education to us, while it does not seem possible that any history or any course of events could be a course of education to the Democratic party. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They seem to be unwilling to learn the facts either of history or of business.

There is no other response to the bill which we present except that you complain that we do not provide for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. All the rest of the talk which you have given us for a week is mere political demagoguery that you have delivered here for the purpose of spreading broadcast among your constituents another attempt to keep Missouri in the benighted condition in which it has been for the last forty years. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

There are things in the bill which I do not think are necessary, and some things which I think I would amend—some things which I imagine will be amended before the bill is finally enacted. But the first section of the bill is a declaration of the gold standard, and it would not be necessary to make that declaration again if it were not for the fact that the Teller resolution passed the Senate by votes of members of your party; if it were not for the fact that you Democrats made a great campaign in 1896, demanding that the country should be put upon a silver standard, and if it were not for the fact that you are here perpetuating that campaign and endeavoring to lay it as a foundation for your next national campaign, and trusting then, along with William J. Bryan, that "in the meantime something will turn up." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Next we provide for the payment of the public obligations in gold. What objection is there to that? The world has expected us to pay them in gold in all our history, and we always have paid in gold. In 1861 the Secretary of the Treasury said to the bankers who were furnishing the money to carry on the Government for sixty days until Congress should decide whether the Government would make a battle for the life of the nation—the Secretary said to them: "The United States has always paid in gold." From that time to this we have paid in gold when we were able to pay anything, and for the last twenty-three years there has not been a question concerning it except the questions which you have raised, and there is not a question now in any place in the world except because of the fact that you are in existence. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I object. I have been trying all day to get five minutes, and have not been able to do so.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That will pin every gentleman down to five minutes. There have been no objections over here.

Several MEMBERS (on the Democratic side). Do not object.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. At the request of gentlemen I will withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Request is made that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CALDERHEAD] may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I thank the gentleman, and I will certainly endeavor to extend the same courtesy to my friends on the other side so far as I have the opportunity. There is a provision which our friends attempt to construe into a retirement of the greenbacks, the provision that these Government notes shall not be reissued again except for gold or except for its equivalent. But there is no more necessity for the retirement of the greenbacks by the face of that provision in the bill than there is for the retirement of the gold. Neither one of them will retire from the business of this country until you make it apparent that you are going to carry the country to a silver basis.

When the world is pouring its flood of gold into this country because business demands it here, you answer, "Let us go to a silver basis." I remind you of one fact in the history of the world that you seem to have entirely overlooked and our own friends have somewhat overlooked. It is a fact that a little over a hundred years ago, when the Government of France was attempting by the severest kind of penalties to compel the people to receive paper money in payment of obligations; at a time when there was a death penalty for a man who refused to receive the notes of France secured by her public lands; at a time when if a man refused to sell his wheat or his cattle or his horses and accept that kind of money in payment for it, he had his property appraised by the public appraiser and sold by him for that money; at a time when that kind of money depreciated until it took a thousand francs to buy a loaf of bread in Paris, that Government repealed all their legal-tender laws, and from every crack and crevice in France, in Germany, and all Europe came the pennies and silver and gold coins crossing over to France, and in six months from the time of that repeal Napoleon paid an army of 200,000 men with gold coin. It is not alone legislating concerning the standard which brings gold into circulation or drives it out of it. It is the promise or the threat to depreciate the legal-tender money that drives the valuable money of the country from circulation.

One more suggestion concerning the bill. There is a provision in it for the establishment of small national banks. It was my privilege four years ago to suggest to the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I was then a member, that the provision should be inserted in one of the bills then under consideration, and a bill was afterwards reported to the House by Mr. VAN VOORHIS, and passed the House. There was no objection to it then. It meets no opposition now. In fact, nearly every distinct proposition contained in this bill was at one time or another, in some form, considered and ordered to be reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

No question in it is a new question, but this is the first time we have offered it so squarely in this House and in the Senate with the power to fight the battle to a finish. Gentlemen, you may depend upon it that the State of Kansas, which my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] correctly credited with having extinguished $65,000,000 of its public and private indebtedness, and which in the same year put into her banks $35,000,000 of deposits—that State will stand by every effort for sound legislation upon the money question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I think I have detained the committee long enough, and perhaps longer than I ought; but I will take the privilege of extending my remarks with this single word, that amongst those who have presented the question here from our side of the House none have given a more correct view of the entire financial question than my distinguished friend, Mr. HILL, from Connecticut and my friend, Mr. FOWLER, from New Jersey. [Applause.]

Both of them have made honest and able efforts to state correctly the facts and foundation principles of a correct financial system for our country. What consideration have you given to them? None.

What amendments do you offer? None. What arguments do you make in reply to them? None. You only demand that we shall adopt the free coinage of silver. Why did you not do this when you had both Houses of Congress and the Executive in your day?

This bill provides for the payment of all our Government obligations in gold. Well, we have always paid in gold; that is no new thing.

The second section also says that all other obligations, public and private, shall be performed in conformity with this standard, and provides that nothing in this bill shall be construed to affect the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar or of the paper currency of this country. Every dollar which is now legal tender is to remain legal tender. No change is made in our money except the power to increase the circulation.

There is no discrimination laid against silver in this bill which does not exist now. It will still be legal tender as now. The tax is removed from national-bank circulation, and so is removed from the rate of interest charged in loans of it. Small banks with small capital may be organized in small cities where business demands them, so that the people will be able to use their own capital at home and not be dependent on large banks at a distance for daily business.

In six days' debate what substitute or amendment have you offered or proposed to offer? Nothing but vituperation and declamation rehearsed from the campaign speeches with which you have deluded your constituents. We have never been able to do things to suit you. When we piled up a surplus in the Treasury you said, "Why do you lock up the people's money?" When we paid off the debt with it, you said, "What are you paying debts before they are due for?"

Then you got hold of the Administration. You got hold of that surplus, and what became of it? You can not tell to this day what you did with it. You can not tell how you managed to get rid of our splendid revenue by a tariff for revenue. You can not tell how you ran us in debt $362,000,000 in three years. Then when we proposed a measure for raising revenue you said, "What are you doing that for? Why don't you declare war for Cuban independence?" You had been wanting Cuba for eighty years, but now you must have Cuban independence.

When we proposed first to protect our own country and protect our own workmen by a tariff that not only protects them but also would support the Government, you said, "What are you pretending to help the people for? Why don't you go to war with Spain?" Then, when we had the war and had won the victories and made the peace with honor by a solemn treaty and undertook to perform our part of that treaty in the Philippines, it was your new apostle of peace who denounced us for imperialism, for militarism, and for making war upon the principles of liberty.

And now, when we have fulfilled every promise we made to the people in 1896—now, when we have made the revenue sufficient, when we have made Cuba free, when we have restored the business of the country and the wages of our workmen—now, when we have kept faith and are about to fulfill the last promise of our covenant with the people, you answer and say, "Why don't you do something else? What are you doing this for?"

Meantime your leaders assemble and consult auguries and pour out libations and look through glasses at birds of omen in the air and pray for a delusion to confuse the minds of the people again. What for? What condition of our country would you change now? Are our working people too busy? Are our business men too busy? Selling too much abroad? Bringing too much gold into our country? Have we too much revenue?

Is our money too rich that it must be diluted for you?

Every prophecy you have made on this subject has failed, and you know it. What now remains for you but to stand aside and let the country do business in peace and in security while you keep silent and abstain from evil.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire at the outset of my remarks to read the caption of this bill introduced by Mr. OVERSTREET. The language is as follows:

A bill to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

And now, my colleagues, let me put special emphasis on these last four words, for they contain the real purpose for which this bill was introduced. I refer to the words "and for other purposes." Here again we see the wisdom of an old saying of a French diplomat, who declared that "language was invented to conceal thought." Much of the time has been consumed throughout the past week in talking about the gold standard, bimetalism, and about prosperity, and still more time has been consumed by tedious and poor excuses for changes of faith and mind on the money question by those who three years ago promised the people to secure for them international bimetalism. Of course we have seen enough since the inauguration of this Administration to know that pledges and promises by the Republican party were made for campaign purposes only, as, for instance, their pledges to assist Cuba in securing independence and their pledges in behalf of civil service.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] charges me with having changed my position on the money question. In a sense this is true; in another it is not. I had accepted without examination, as thousands of others had accepted as correct political philosophy, the theory of the gold worshippers that the only money that could be sound and honest was gold. I had been busy with my work as a lawyer and had paid no more attention to the science of money than I had to the science of astronomy or chemistry. In fact, at that time I was as ignorant of the principles and facts involved in an intelligent consideration of the money question as most of the gentlemen on the Republican side of this House are to-day. I was for a gold standard at that time, as I fear many of my Republican colleagues and a few of my New York Democratic colleagues are to-day, simply because it was fashionable. I took up the subject in the early part of 1896 as a student, with the expectation and intention of proving that the gold standard was for the best interests of the masses of the people of the American Republic.

Investigating that case as I had been accustomed as a lawyer to investigate cases of clients, I found, and so declared to the public, that the gold standard is to the best interests of the few—that is, the money-lending classes in Wall street and Lombard street; but when you take up the same question with reference to the best interests of 98 per cent of the people of this Republic you will agree with Mr. GROSVENOR when he voted in favor of the Stanley Matthews resolution, which declared that the Government could honestly pay its bonds in silver dollars.

Bismarck in 1881 stated his case in these words:

Before I concerned myself personally with customs questions I did not represent my own convictions, but those of my colleague, Delbrück, whom I regarded as the right man in the right place, for I had no time to form my own views. I can not properly say that I formerly held other views than now. I deny that my former views were opposed to my present, for I had none. I was the obedient disciple of Delbrück, and I supported his views when I supported views at all.

And so I, like Bismarck, was the disciple of the bankers and others, whom I regarded as authority on the money question. In 1896, when almost everybody, in the heat and excitement of the discussions of the day, took up the money question, I investigated the subject for myself and made my declaration to the people, stating that I was prepared to support my judgment in favor of bimetalism either in speeches or debates. In the Congressional contest which followed, although my opponent had carried the capital district of Ohio by 1,591 in 1894, I succeeded in drawing him into four debates on the money question, and by the judgment of the people of the district defeated him by 49 votes out of 47,000 votes cast.

As a result of that election I held my first public office as a member of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and I deny that on any issue raised between the St. Louis platform and the Chicago platform I have had to become a Janus-faced legislator, either on the floor of this House or elsewhere; and I have had the satisfaction of supporting with such zeal and sincerity not only the Cuban plank of the Chicago platform, but also the plank of the St. Louis platform on the question of Cuban independence. In fact I drew down upon me the ill-will and malice of every hypocrite in the Republican party who pretended to be in favor of Cuban independence throughout the campaign of 1896, but was too cowardly to assist in securing a declaration either in favor of their independence or their beligerent rights when that question was repeatedly brought to the attention of this House.

There is still another difference between any apparent change I have made on the money question and the changes made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and many of his Republican colleagues. I changed to the side of the poor and struggling millions, while they changed to the side of the national bankers' trust and other trusts. I went over to the side where neither social nor financial profit would follow and where the slander and libel of a venal and syndicated press would be my only reward, while the gentleman from Ohio and others with him by their change secured the constant and persistent attention of a friendly press as well as liberal contributions to corruption funds to secure their reelection, so that the national honor might be maintained even at the price of bribery, fraud, intimidation, and coercion.

James Russell Lowell said:

Wise men change their opinions; the foolish and dead alone never change theirs.

From the number of changes made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] it is safe to say that he must be the wisest man on the floor of this House. He voted for silver dollars under the Stanley Matthews resolution to pay Government bonds, and in 1894 he stood in his district and made a campaign on a platform demanding an increasing volume of currency, even to such an extent as a volume equal to $40 per capita. In 1896 he ran on a platform, when our per capita was $20, or only one-half as much, and said that such a volume was sufficient, unless the English Government would consent to allow us a larger amount, and if England would not consent, then that was enough, because you had got a dollar that would buy twice as much as you could buy before with the dollar. In one breath he was for plenty of money, and in the next for a scarcity of money. But, gentlemen, this is not a money bill; this is not a coinage bill; this is neither a gold-standard nor a bimetallic-standard bill. This is a bill prepared by the National Bankers' Association for this House, and it is their underlying scheme that lies between the lines in this bill.

Two years ago we were called in extra session to pass an alleged tariff bill, and but a few months since one of the members of the sugar trust stepped upon the witness stand and testified that the tariff bill was the "mother of trusts." It was argued here as a bill to stimulate industry; but instead of that it has proven to be a bill to legalize wholesale robbery. Since the passage of that bill the trusts have consummated their schemes, so that to-day the farmer, instead of paying from $17 to $20 a ton for wire, is obliged to pay from $40 to $42 a ton, and the home builders instead of buying nails at $1.75 a keg are compelled to pay $3.00 a keg. In other words, when the farmer steps up to buy a ton of wire he not only pays for it, but must tamely submit to the long fingers of the trust going down into his pocket and taking out $20 for nothing. So the home builder, when he buys 10 kegs of nails, is also sad to find that a trust has picked his pocket and left him $20 short.

How much better are these trusts than highway robbers? Why should Jesse James have been punished for holding up a train and taking the watches and purses of the passengers? He did business by retail, while the party that pretends to be so solicitous about our national honor and the flag permits and aids and abets the trusts in doing a hold-up business by wholesale. Why not introduce a bill in all frankness to amend one of the Ten Commandments, and instead of saying "Thou shalt not steal," say "Thou shalt not steal except on a large scale." Such, in substance, was the effect of the Dingley bill; and knowing your great wisdom and long-headed ability on the side of the Administration forces, I must concede that you undoubtedly knew what was wanted, and you framed the bill accordingly. Notwithstanding the caption and the speeches you prepared, for it seemed to be for a "tariff bill," yet it is now plain that between the lines you prepared a trust bill, and that is why it has been called "the mother of trusts."

This bill before the House to-day is for the benefit of the 3,600 national banks, who constitute a secret society that has more power than the million Masons, the million Odd Fellows, and the half million Knights of Pythias combined. No secret society on the face of the earth ever wielded such influence and such power. The National Bankers' Association undoubtedly prepared this bill, and that is why the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said in his remarks that the President recommended this bill and that it is the same bill recommended by the National Bankers' Association last summer. Of course it is the same bill. Their attorneys and agents prepared it, and you would scarcely expect a father to repudiate his own child. And, in this connection, I ask that an editorial in the New York Sun of the 12th of December, under the caption, "A leader in Congress," be read with reference to this bill. I send the editorial to the Clerk's desk to be read there:

The Clerk read as follows:

[New York Sun, December 12.]

A LEADER IN CONGRESS!

In his speech in the House of Representatives yesterday on the currency bill Mr. OVERSTREET, of Indiana, the introducer of the bill, said that the Secretary of the Treasury, "by a single order directing the use of silver in the discharge of our obligations, may completely destroy the parity and shift the standard to the metal so used."

This is sheer nonsense. The Secretary of the Treasury has no more power to use the metal silver in the discharge of our obligations than he has to use the metal gold. He can use only gold coin or silver coin.

Gold coin is, indeed, worth as currency no more than the gold it contains, because any owner of gold can at pleasure have it converted into coin in unlimited quantities free of charge, but the case is quite different with silver. Silver dollars pass current as equal to gold dollars to the number of 450,000,000, although the metal of which they are composed is equal in value to only about 40 cents in gold, for the reason that the coinage of them is a Government monopoly and is not open to the public.

Nothing but unlimited free-silver coinage can reduce the value of the silver dollars to their value as metal, and Mr. OVERSTREET betrays on the subject an ignorance of fact and of law which in a leader in Congress is ludicrous, not to say disgraceful.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LENTZ. "Mr. OVERSTREET," says the New York Sun, "betrays an ignorance of this bill which is ludicrous, not to say disgraceful." If my friend Mr. OVERSTREET, against whom I have nothing whatever to say, made so unsatisfactory a presentation and explanation of this bill on the floor of this House that it demoralized the bankers of New York, and made himself ludicrous in their supreme eye, it would be certified to by just such an editorial in the New York Sun.

The New York Sun, if it speaks for anybody, speaks for the money-power of New York City. It is evident from that editorial that Mr. OVERSTREET did not understand the bill which he presented to this House. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] It is apparent, my friends, that before this country gets through with this infernal bill, and after the Treasury Department and the other Departments have placed their interpretation upon it, which the national bankers and the attorneys for the national bankers well know will be placed upon it, you will again be using your explanation machines on the other side of the House with even greater diligence and with greater continuity, if possible, than you have during the past week. You will have to stand before this House and say, "I stood by the bill because the caucus indorsed the bill."

I say to you, my friends, that if Mr. OVERSTREET does not understand the bill which he is responsible for, and if New York City says it is ludicrous for him to talk on the floor of this House about this bill in the way he is talking, then you will pass another bill here which, like the Dingley "mother of trusts," will be equivalent to carrying another serpent to the firesides of the people; and when the serpent is thawed out sufficiently, it will sting the children. This bill is intended to increase the power of the national banks, and, in my opinion, it has no other purpose. All there is in it on the standard dollar of the country is already in the law of 1873. This bill is the bill of the national bankers, and will be passed for the national bankers at the request of the national bankers by the agents of the national bankers. Why have you not provided in it that the Government should issue currency to any of the 9,000 banks other than the 3,600 national banks upon the deposit of bonds?

Why should not the Government issue to private banks, to State banks, and to individuals a thousand dollars when they deposit a thousand-dollar bond? Answer, if you please. Why should not any man or woman who happens to have a thousand or two thousand dollars in bonds be able to send it to the Treasury and have the Treasury deliver to him or her his thousand or two thousand dollars with which to build a little house or buy a little home? Answer why that should not be in this bill. If the Government can issue good money to the national banks upon the deposit of bonds, why can it not issue to the other 9,000 banks and to individuals equally good money upon the deposit of bonds? Answer me if you can! Answer me if you dare!

If the Government can issue good money to national banks for bonds, why could not it issue good money to the widow and orphan if they happen to inherit a bond, and why should not the widow and orphan at the same time draw interest on it while they are using the money in building a home and while the national banker is using his money in building stacks of surplus and dividends? No; you will never answer that question fairly and squarely, because this bill is in the interest of the national banks.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENTZ. Yes; for a question or an answer.

Mr. HILL. I will read a part of the national platform of the Democratic party, which will answer the gentleman's question.

Congress alone has the power to coin and issue money. We therefore demand that the power to issue notes to circulate as money be taken from the national banks and that all paper money shall be issued directly by the Treasury Department.

Mr. LENTZ. I do not see that that is any answer to my question. Nobody but an owl from Maine would think that was an answer to the question I have been asking.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Or from Connecticut.

Mr. LENTZ. No, I mean Mark Twain's owl from Maine.

If the Government will hand out a thousand dollars or $25,000 to a national bank upon the deposit of bonds, why not pass out a thousand dollars to some poor man who is unfortunate enough to own only one bond? Answer that in your own time. I repeat it and you dare not answer. And I repeat my first proposition, that this is not a coinage bill and that it is purely a national-bank bill, and nothing more nor less. The purpose of this bill is not so much to fasten the gold standard upon us as it is to fasten the national banks upon us.

Now, I make this prediction: That the time will come when you will confess that this bill had things in it that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] did not understand and that no man on the committee that reported it here understood; and that no man who went down to Atlantic City last spring to come back with this bill understood.

In 1896 there was a shortage in the money supply, and, as usual, falling prices and hard times resulted from this condition. The Democrats and other reform forces, in order to remove this disastrous condition, advocated a larger money supply, and had the courage and honesty to declare that this could most surely be done by returning to the money of the Constitution, bimetallicism, and they were frank enough to tell the people in words and figures that they agreed with Lincoln in the ratio of 16 to 1, and that they also agreed with Lincoln in his last public utterance, on the 14th day of April, 1865, wherein he said:

The more gold and silver we mine so much the easier we make the payment of the national debt. I am going to encourage that in every possible way.

In strange contrast with Abraham Lincoln, who wanted the payment of the national debt and other debts made "easier," by directing the whole people, as well as the million disbanded soldiers, to the mining of gold and silver, we see to-day the Administration of William McKinley recommending that this House pass the bill we are to-day considering, and which, as stated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], has been recommended by the National Bankers' Association. In other words, the Administration in this measure, as well as every other measure which has come before this House, shows itself unhesitatingly and unmistakably in favor of anything demanded by the national banks, the trusts, and other forms of organized greed, while Abraham Lincoln, from whom this Administration claims to be a legitimate heir, proclaimed to the people not only of this Republic, but to the world, in his first annual message to Congress that—

Labor is prior to and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration.

In other words, Abraham Lincoln believed that labor is the superior of capital, while this Administration by every act demonstrates that it believes that capital is the superior of labor.

I have already stated what the Democrats, the Populists, and Lincoln Republicans stood for in 1896. The McKinley Republicans and Hanna Democrats contended that falling prices were a distinct advantage, that the dollar could not be made too good, that it could not be made to buy too much, that if dollars could be made so scarce that one of them would buy 4 bushels of wheat instead of 1 bushel, or 10 bushels of corn instead of 3, such a dollar would be an honest dollar and more sound and more reliable than the dollars advocated by Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln. The gold worshipers in 1896 argued throughout that memorable campaign that to increase the volume of money, to make more dollars, would be to cheapen them and would be doing an injustice to those holding insurance policies, or deposit books of the savings banks, or mortgages, or bonds, or other evidences of credit. Throughout the past week the advocates of this bill have boasted much of prosperity and are particularly profuse and elaborate in claiming that the increase in the volume of currency which we now have is to the honor and glory of the very party that argued against an increasing currency three years ago. No man will undertake to point to any legislation of this Administration and claim that such legislation is responsible for our increased volume of currency unless he is willing to have either his honesty or intelligence questioned by those who hear him.

Since 1896 the volume of money has increased in the United States from natural causes, such as shortage of crops and famines abroad, which produced in the United States increased exports of commodities and increased imports of cash. In addition to this we have had an increased output of gold in our own country, and in consequence of this increased volume of money an era of rising prices has followed, stimulating industry and business, thus proving the principles advocated by the Democratic party in 1896. And under these conditions the farmers and laborers of the land would have shared much more of the fruits of this increase had it not been that the Republican party has promoted and developed an empire of trusts, which, by the power of monopoly, hold down abnormally low the prices of labor and the prices of the products of the farm and the mine, while, on the other hand, the prices of all articles manufactured by the trusts are thrust up beyond all reason, conscience, or decency. Thus trusts counteract and prevent profits which should accrue to all legitimate laborers, farmers, and business men from the increased volume of money.

The owners of these trusts are not satisfied with the mere control of the output of all the commodities which enter into the food, clothing, and shelter of humanity. To-day we see their great and all-controlling influence at work in what ought to be a free and independent parliamentary body. Crude, indeed, must be the legislator here who can not see that the hand of the attorney of the National Bankers' Association has written this currency bill, so that the same men who control the output of tin and wire and nails shall also control the output of money. The organization that moves this body and dominates the majority side of it contends that the 80,000,000 American citizens can not make a good dollar out of silver, but that 3,600 national bankers can make good money out of paper, and the paper based not on labor but on the debt of the Government. In other words, the Bankers' Association, that is responsible for this bill, has made a sight draft on the majority side of Congress, and the passage of this bill must be delivered before the close of banking hours next Monday.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] spoke of delivering this bill as a Christmas gift to the business interests of the country. He evidently considered that the 3,600 national bankers are the "only" business interests of the United States, and for some reason his party has a debt of gratitude to pay in the form of a Christmas gift. Is that debt the debt created by the gigantic corruption fund of 1896? In addition to opening the eyes of many by your catering to the bankers you will by this act emphasize the doctrine we have maintained as to the blessings which follow an increasing currency. Either you must concede this or you must confess that the additional 10 per cent of currency herein provided for national banks to receive upon deposit of bonds is purely for the benefit of the banker and not for the public good. And while you are bragging about prosperity are you not afraid someone will ask you why you meddle with a currency system that was in force at the time this prosperity blew in upon us? Are you not afraid that it may be necessary to write upon the tombstone of your party this epitaph which the Persian King ordered to be placed over his grave—

I was well, but wished to be better. Took physic and died.

In no other first-class country in the world is the speculative class in control of the range of prices as it is here in the United States. In Germany, Austria, and Russia the government controls entirely the range of prices within the country by controlling the bank rate. In England it is the commercial class that controls the bank rate, and thereby the range of prices. No banker is permitted to become a member of the board of directors of the Bank of England. Bagehot emphasizes this in his volume entitled Lombard Street.

In France the control of the price level is maintained by a combination of representatives of the commercial classes, and of appointees of the Government. While in the United States the speculative class controls the range of prices by controlling the volume of money and the bank rate, and the same class by the agency of trusts also controls the output of shops, mills, and factories, and thus are enabled to dictate the wages of labor, and in due time they expect and intend to destroy every labor union in this Republic, and when they have done this they will have destroyed the one remaining class who still have some conception of the meaning of the expressions free speech, free thought, free press, free schools, and a free ballot. When they have blotted out of existence the organizations of labor they will have destroyed the last hope of a free government.

This bill is framed in behalf of the National Bankers' Association and this association after the passage of this bill will be the most powerful and arrogant trust on the face of the earth. It will be the oligarchy that will eventually convert the American Republic into one of the several forms of despotism which have characterized the decay and destruction of all the efforts and all the hopes of the philosophers and the patriots of the centuries gone by in their struggles for free government.

The policy of the reform forces in this country is to adopt a system of finance which will take from the speculators the control of the money volume and prices. It will continue to be our battle cry in the future, as it was in the memorable campaigns of Andrew Jackson and William Jennings Bryan that, "The national banks must go out of the governing business." For my part, I know of nothing that will go farther toward opening the eyes of the voters of the land than the fact that every man on the Republican side of this House has been driven in under the lash of the caucus whip to confess his absolute subserviency to the National Bankers' Association.

In 1878, at the passage of the Bland-Allison bill; in 1890, at the passage of the Sherman law; in 1893, at the repeal of the Sherman law, and in the Presidential campaign of 1896 the monetary discussions among the people of this Republic continued with increasing intensity, and each time that the matter came before the American people the differences grew apace, until the plutocratic element of the old Democratic party joined the Wall-street end of the Republican party, and the Lincoln Republicans separated themselves from their old associates and identified themselves with the Jeffersonian Democrats and Populists and other reform forces of the country. To-day there are two well-defined parties.

We of the one espouse the cause of the farmer, the merchant, the small manufacturer, the miner, the wage-earner, and all other producers and creators of wealth. You champion the cause of the speculators, whose greed for dollars has made them as blind as misers to the just rights of man, the reasonable comforts of the homes, and the education of the children of the plain people, the honest and industrious millions. The aims and schemes of your party as now constituted all tend to intrench in castles and palaces the lords and barons of trusts, whose power is already so gigantic that when compared with the power of the feudal lords of the dark ages the latter sink to the stature of pigmies.

The aim of the reform forces is to destroy not only the money trust, but all the trusts that fatten in this land of liberty, and your united vote as you walk up and register the same on Monday next, like dumb driven cattle under the lash of the National Bankers' Association, will in itself be such an object lesson that it will be easy for the people to understand and interpret your complete subserviency to the money power and your complete idolatry and worship of the golden calf.

I take the liberty, unauthorized though I be, to challenge you now to release your imperial President from his vine-clad porch in Canton, Ohio, in the next campaign, and let him meet if he dare in debate on any rostrum our standard bearer, William Jennings Bryan. I challenge you now to prepare your Chief Executive, if you dare, to come before the people and defend his policy in placing the entire money volume of the land within the control of the National Bankers' Association. And I challenge you now to prepare him to explain this repudiation and destruction of the greenback, which was good enough and honest enough to pay Abraham Lincoln's hundreds of thousands who sacrificed their lives and their health that the Union might live.

You have talked about prosperity. If war and foreign complications cause prosperity, then let us, like the Romans, carry our spears and battle-axes into every clime and every nation. If commercial greed and trade justify our course in the Orient, why not look after additional trade in Europe also? Why not offer England $20,000,000 for Ireland, telling her we need the island as a coaling station in order to extend our commerce, and to carry our flag across Great Britain and the Continent? If England refuses to accept the $20,000,000, let us shoot benevolent assimilation into her and all the while increase our prosperity. What has your party done for prosperity? What legislation has made prosperity? We voted in the Fifty-fifth Congress $100,000 to pay for free transportation of the food that was donated to the starving millions in India. That famine was so far-reaching in its horrors that it was said that 12,000,000 human beings were swallowed up in its greed.

Was that famine the result of anything the Republican party did? If you could go down and ask the spirits that sank beneath the earth in that trying ordeal I think they would say that that was not an act of Providence, but they would rather impute it to the imps of hell. You claim the credit of it for the Republican party on that side of the House. You may have it if you desire,

As a result of that famine and other shortages of food in the Eastern part of the world, we have largely increased our exports of farm products, and in return have received large imports of cash and increased our circulating medium, and there is a temporary betterment of conditions.

You complain that each one of us does not stand here and reaffirm the Chicago platform, does not repronounce the name of Bryan, does not declare that he is for each of them, and you say that therefore we have abandoned them. Must we stand here each day and repeat the multiplication table or be accused of abandoning that? Does the preacher each Sunday preach on the texts, "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not bear false witness," "Thou shalt not commit adultery"? And if he does not repeat these sermons each Sunday do you say on Monday morning that he is in favor of all of them and that he has abandoned his opposition to them? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is an absurdity; that is childish talk. I say to you that so far as I am concerned—and I know I represent at least 16 to 1 of the Democrats on this floor when I say it—we are in favor of the reaffirmation of the Chicago platform of 1896. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are in favor of renominating William Jennings Bryan. [Applause on Democratic side.] And in addition to reaffirming the Chicago platform, we shall declare against trusts, militarism, and imperialism, and add a plank against slavery and polygamy in the Sulu Islands, and a plank against the British alliance—an alliance that is now open and apparent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Great Britain is shooting down liberty in South Africa, while you are shooting it down in the Philippine Islands. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is evidence sufficient that both Governments are operating upon parallel lines. The first blossom of liberty in the Orient is to be cut off by the Republican party of the United States, and the first substantial struggle for liberty in Africa is to be shot down in its infancy by the Queen of England, while the Czar of Russia is asking for peace. If things are not upside down, how can the Republican party stand impotent and silent while England is shooting to death a republic in South Africa, and while, under the military and imperialistic power that patronage has delivered to the President here, the crime of crimes is being committed in the Philippines under the Stars and Stripes of the Union?

The President, at Madison, Wis., said:

Only one small fraction of one small tribe is resisting our authority in the Orient.

Aye, my friends, and the President is sending an army there of 75,000 men to subdue "one small fraction of one small tribe." An army larger than Sherman had when he marched to the sea, an army larger than Grant needed to take Vicksburg, an army larger than Lee surrendered at Richmond, is now called into requisition and kept there for nearly a year to subdue "one small faction of one small tribe." Is this the source of your prosperity?

Does anyone believe if General Miles had been sent to the Philippines a year ago, with full power to restore peace, that he would not have secured it long since without the waste of life and health and treasure expended in a war which John Sherman, ex-Senator Edmunds, ex-Speaker Reed, Carl Schurz, Senator Hoar, ex-Governor Boutwell, and thousands of other Republicans think "an unnecessary, an uncalled-for, and an unjust war?"

Aside from passing the Dingley "mother of trusts," you have also passed a bill under which you have sold two hundred millions of bonds, and in that way your war with Spain drew from the vaults and hiding places an additional volume of currency, which, by the storms of war, was scattered throughout all the avenues of business and trade. In addition to this you have burdened the people with stamp taxes and war taxes that are taking from their meager pockets hundreds of millions of dollars to carry on a war against liberty on the other side of the earth that will be the shame and humiliation of the American people for generations to come, and will require us in some sane moment to apologize to the spirits of Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln.

Aside from the legislation I have already mentioned, what, if you please, has the Republican Administration done since the 4th of March, 1897? As I recall it, its first act was to coax and wheedle John Sherman out of a seat in the Senate, promising him a place in the Cabinet. Is this the source of your prosperity? A little later on you unceremoniously kicked the sage of Mansfield, the nestor of the Republican party, out of the Cabinet without daring to give to the world your reason or excuse for the same. Is this the source of your prosperity? You remained impotent and whined that you would have "peace at any price," although a Spaniard insulted you with the charge that your President was nothing but a "low politician." Is this the source of your prosperity?

Your Administration sent the Maine in January, 1898, carrying the Stars and Stripes as an emblem of good will to Spain, rather than as a ray of hope to Cuba struggling for independence.

Although in the St. Louis platform you professed sympathy for Cuba in "her struggles to free herself from European domination," you sent our good ship Maine as an encouragement to Spain, and as a result of it 266 American lives were sacrificed to Spanish treachery. Is this the source of your prosperity?

In your St. Louis platform you also promised the old soldiers who saved the Union that they should receive fair treatment and generous recognition, whereas in fact throughout these three years you have left almost neglected 600,000 applications of the old soldiers for pensions, and to-day are practicing the same policy of delay in the treatment of our soldiers in the Spanish-American war who came home permeated with diseases imposed upon them by the beef trust and the horse doctors. Is this the source of your prosperity?

After Attorney-General McKenna was sent from the Cabinet to a place on the Supreme Bench you took into the Cabinet as Attorney-General a man who was governor of New Jersey, the home and stronghold of these pirates known as trusts and syndicates, who, like pirates of old, day and night scan the seas to loot and plunder other vessels too weak to cope with them. And this Attorney-General promptly discovered that the laws against trusts were impotent and unavailing. Is this the source of your prosperity?

After Egan had been court-martialed and found unworthy of a place in the American Army your President restored him to a full salary of $5,500 a year for the next six years and $4,135 a year for the remainder of his life. In all he will draw from the National Treasury $75,000 if he lives his natural expectancy, although he will never render another day's service to our Government. Is this the source of your prosperity?

Your beef trust and horse doctors murdered about 4,800 men, while the Spaniards only killed 350. Is this the source of your prosperity? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You humiliated and subordinated that man who won the most magnificent naval victory that the world has ever seen—Winfield Scott Schley. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Is this the source of your prosperity? You have subordinated and humiliated General Miles, whom Abraham Lincoln promoted for deeds of skill and heroic courage from battle to battle until he had climbed up the ladder of military fame from a clerk in a store to that of brevet major-general of the United States Army. Is this the source of your prosperity? You ignored and humiliated scores of military leaders and experts trained at West Point and in the Indian wars at an expense of millions of dollars, and subordinated such as these by putting politicians in the army saddles. Is this the source of your prosperity? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If you have done anything to produce prosperity, answer me, if you please, and tell me what it was. You will live to be ashamed of your record. One gentleman talked about prosperity and the consequent result of the election in 1898. In the last Congress you had the advantage of the reform forces by 57 votes. In this House we are in the minority by only 13 votes. Is this an evidence of your prosperity? We are satisfied with the progress we have made. And now in closing let me give you all my New Year greeting in the language of Howard S. Taylor, of Chicago:

Did our Liberty Bell ring in vain?
Was our Declaration a lie?
Must we turn to the Old World again,
With the penitent prodigal's cry?
Must we arm us and march in the van
Of Europe's barbaric parade,
And boom out a gunpowder gospel to man
To open a pathway for trade?
Shall we strut through the world and bluster and brag
With the dollar mark stamped on the brave old flag?

Nay, haul up the flag—raise it high—
Not yet is its spirit spent!
Let it sing in the wind and the sky
The truth that it always meant!
Let it sing of the birthright of man,
Of progress that never can lag,
Let it sing that trade may go where it can,
But liberty follows the flag!
Yea, haul up Old Glory—but, comrades, take heed
That no man shall part the old flag from the creed!

[Prolonged applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. The language of the gentleman who has just taken his seat reminds me of a homely expression of Josh Billings:

It is better not to know so many things than to know so many things that ain't so.

[Laughter.]

I shall undertake to reply in a very few words to the personal criticism made by the gentleman. He could well have supplemented his remarks in relation to the New York editorial by a quotation from the same speech, which I delivered upon this floor, in which I stated that there came to this bill no criticisms against the banking feature except demagogic attacks from the other side of the Chamber.

That is the same character of answer which this week has demonstrated to have been presented by the opponents of this measure. The gentlemen who were selected to frame this bill, having for their guide the study and care of financiers of this country for many years, have given the broadest opportunity for criticism in debate, and the answer comes only in the character of the language of the editorial used by the gentleman from Ohio.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that the bond of this Government which he attacked is the only bond which the people of this country have ever accepted in the fullest faith. I call his attention to the fact that of all the bonded indebtedness of the United States there is held by foreign holders less than $18,000,000; $13,676,000 of it is held by foreign insurance companies; and that of the $200,000,000 of bonds issued to conduct the Spanish-American war, less than $900,000 are held by foreigners and not one dollar by foreign individuals. These statistics demonstrate that the American bond is largely held by the American people, who received them willingly and patriotically. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but one remark to make relative to the editorial. The gentleman reads from the New York Sun. No apologies are necessary for the statement that is there made. It can be easily demonstrated by fair argument. But it is a strange anomaly, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio, who in a ten-minute debate has undertaken rapidly to pass over all the subjects in modern politics, with a speed only equaled by that with which his good friend Aguinaldo is measuring the territory of Luzon [laughter and applause], should have undertaken to prove the verity of his statement by the New York Sun. It reminds me of a little verse by Coleridge:

The river Rhine, it is well known,
Doth wash the city of Cologne;
But tell me, nymphs, what power divine
Shall henceforth wash the river Rhine?

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill in its entirety and in its every feature. On the question of the standard of value or bimetalism or free coinage at the existing legal ratio I can add nothing to what I have had the honor to say before the people whose commission I hold and to what I had the honor to say in this House in the Fifty-fifth Congress. When the Teller resolution was under consideration in the Fifty-fifth Congress, I argued at length against the payment of the United States bonds and other obligations of the Government in gold only. But I knew then, as I know now, that the Republican party would take the position that the representatives of that party have assumed in this discussion.

Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allowed me I shall not attempt to discuss the financial or coinage question. I shall not at this late hour inflict a speech upon the House. Nothing that I can say would change the vote of any Republican here, as nothing that they have said or may say could change me. I am satisfied that I am right and that those whom I represent are right in their opposition to the features of the pending measure. Time will prove the correctness of this opposition.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to put in the RECORD a Republican argument made against the national-bank system. This argument is applicable to that feature of the bill which proposes to enlarge the national-bank system—a system that I believe is intended by the framers of this bill and those whose tools they are to enlarge and perpetuate, and I do not doubt that their plan is bottomed upon an ever-increasing and perpetual public indebtedness.

Public debts are not blessings to the plain and honest people, who pay the taxes that are absorbed by interest on bonds. A trust composed of the national banks of New York and their allies given the exclusive power—the governmental function—of issuing the currency of the country is the most dangerous of all trusts and the most criminal of all combines.

Mr. Chairman, I read from House Report No. 1575, second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. The report was made by Mr. McCLEARY, of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], both of whom now favor this bill, were members. I put into the RECORD these quotations from the report, so that some of you on the Republican side can explain some more of your inconsistencies and answer some of your arguments against national banks. The report goes on to say:

But the system of bond based bank-note issues is by its very nature open to serious objections.

The vital thing to remember in considering this subject is that currency is simply an instrument of trade, a means of effecting exchanges; that it has no other use or purpose, and that therefore its volume should depend upon and be responsive to the demands of trade. But in this vital matter a system of bond-based bank notes signally fails.

In the first place, the volume of notes under this system is largely determined by the state of the Government's credit. The issue of notes is conditioned upon the prior purchase of Government bonds. If, then, the credit of Government be low, the bonds bear a high rate of interest and yet can be bought for a small price. Under such circumstances it will be profitable to buy the bonds and issue notes upon them. But as the credit of the Government improves the bonds bring a higher price and pay a lower rate of interest. Then it becomes unprofitable to invest in the bonds and issue the notes. . . .

In the second place, the higher the prevailing commercial rate of interest, the less likely are bond-based notes to be issued. . . .

In other words, to those sections of our country where capital is plentiful and where the rates of interest are low, our present system gives increase to abundance; while to those sections where rates of interest are high, showing the need of loanable funds, the system gives little relief. In order to secure bank notes for circulation, a community must invest more capital in bonds than it gets back in the form of bank notes—that is, a community is required under our present system to send away a part of its loanable capital for investment at a low rate. But this is precisely what a community having inadequate loanable capital can not afford to do. And if a portion of the loanable capital be sent away for this low-rate investment, the rate of interest on the remaining funds must be raised.

In the third place, as a corollary of the above, a system of bank-note issues based on Government bonds can not be responsive to seasonal demands. In the agricultural communities of the West and South the demand for currency during the three or four months in which the bulk of the crop is being moved is very much greater than it is during the rest of the year, and to be of most service the funds must be in the form of coin or bills, preferably the latter. These extra funds the banks in the vicinity ought to be able to provide through increased issue of bank notes based upon the values, promptly realizable, of the crops themselves; but to this seasonal demand the local banks are under the present system utterly unable to respond.

To secure the funds the buyers of the products must go to the money centers and borrow. Their demand for funds must there meet and compete with other demands of the same kind, and the consequence is that they can command the necessary funds only by offering a higher rate of interest. This, of course, means that so much less can be paid for the products, and in so far as the rate is unnecessarily high there is an unnecessary loss to the producer. . . .

In the fourth place, as a second corollary of the above, bank-note issues can not under the present system respond promptly to emergency demands for note currency. A good illustration of the delay in responding to such demand was furnished in the summer of 1893:

"The New York banks held on June 1, 1893, a surplus of $21,000,000 in excess of their legal reserve. At that time the volume of national-bank notes outstanding was about $177,000,000. By the 1st of August extraordinary demands for currency had drawn down the reserve to $14,000,000 below the legal minimum, and the outstanding notes were only about $5,000,000 more than on June 1.

"By September 1, however, when the reserves were but $1,500,000 below the minimum, when the urgency was past and currency was once more comparatively abundant, the notes had begun to expand and had already reached $199,800,000, subsequently rising to $206,300,000 on November 1, notwithstanding the continued decrease in the demand for them."

Having been called into existence not by the requirements of trade but by the exigencies of the Government, being based on the debt of the country instead of its wealth, on what our people collectively owe instead of what they individually own, our present system of bank-note issue is not a true bank currency, and is therefore unresponsive to the demands of trade, coming forth when and where there is little demand for it and responding slowly or not at all when and where the need is urgent. And the trouble is inherent in the system; it can not be remedied except by a change of basis.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly aware that the most logical, eloquent, and earnest protest against the pending measure—even though it carried with it that conviction which follows a demonstration—would prove wholly ineffective in the matter of changing a single vote on the Republican side of this Chamber.

I therefore frankly confess that I am absolutely without hope of converting any one of them to oppose the bill under consideration; but I take advantage of this opportunity merely to record an honest, emphatic, and conscientious protest against a measure being foisted upon the people which will, as certainly as time lasts to put its blighting principles into active operation, bring chaos and destruction to our business interests, and prove a curse to the masses of our people.

Sir, the amount of sorrow and distress this hateful measure will bring and the fearful cost in toil and sweat it will entail upon our countrymen is impossible of computation. And after this bill shall have been passed, as pass it surely will, in obedience to the demands of the "money changers," the time will not be far distant when the men and women throughout this land, begging for the mean privilege of earning a living, will keenly realize that: "There has been a gang of pirates thundering at the door of this Capitol until they drove their representatives into the most preposterous acts of bad faith and legalized robbery ever perpetrated against a free people."

This bill commits us by express legislation more firmly to the single gold standard, and it further means that all Government bonds and interest-bearing indebtedness now existing or to be issued or contracted shall be paid, not in coin—gold or silver or both—as the original contract provides, at the option of the Government, but both interest and principal shall hereafter be paid in gold; that all United States Treasury notes and greenbacks shall be redeemed in gold; that the silver dollar, so long a constitutional primary money and full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, shall become token money, to be redeemed in gold. Silver certificates can only be issued in denominations of one, two, and three dollars, which restricts their use to minor transactions. This bill further means that national banks may issue their notes to the full amount of their capital stock, and at the same time their taxation is decreased. It clothes the Secretary of the Treasury with full power to issue and sell bonds of the United States at his pleasure.

We submit, sir, that the single gold standard is disastrous to the best interests of the country, because there is an inadequate supply of gold to meet the requirements thus made upon it. Our contention for the double standard does not grow out of any prejudice against gold or love for silver in themselves, but proceeds from an adherence to the quantitative theory of money.

Statistics prove that the business world has always enjoyed seasons of greatest prosperity when the largest volume of money was in circulation, and that the periods of greatest financial depression, shipwreck, and disaster invariably occurred when the volume of money was contracted. When money is plentiful and doing active money service in the channels of commerce and business enterprise, wages and the products of labor are high and the country generally is prosperous. The converse of this is equally true. In fact, it has become an axiom in political economy that "the volume of money in any country determines the prices of its products."

The contention of the Democratic party has been fully justified by the events and conditions of recent years. Our platform of 1896 declared for the restoration of silver to the position it occupied as a constitutional money metal prior to 1873. We then held that there was an insufficient volume of money to meet the demands of trade and commerce, and that the free and unlimited coinage of silver, with full legal-tender qualities in payment of all debts, public and private, would in some measure relieve the situation by increasing the quantity of basic or primary money.

Our great antagonist, the Republican party, in its national platform of 1896 agreed with the Democracy in advocating bimetallism, but with the qualification that bimetallism should be with international agreement alone, and until such agreement could be secured the single gold standard should be maintained. And upon this proposition the two parties joined issue and appealed to the country.

While both contending parties claim a vindication of their policies, yet, sir, I submit without fear of successful contradiction that, although the Democratic party went down to defeat, the principles for which it contended have triumphed signally.

The gentlemen upon the Republican side of this Chamber have well depicted the direful financial and social condition of 1896. They spoke in graphic terms of the "soup houses" then established to feed the hungry poor. They cited the multiplied bankruptcies among our merchants, and referred to the idleness among mechanics and artisans. They described the miners out of employment, with their dependant families to be fed, clothed, and sheltered from the rigors of approaching winter. The farmers are said to have been groaning under the weight of mortgaged homes; and then, pointing to present conditions with an air of arrogance and bigotry truly astonishing, they exclaim: "See what we, the original and only Republican party, have done for the people!" Gentlemen, unless you are in league with the Supreme Ruler of the universe and the God of harvests, how very ridiculous, in the light of reason, your boast appears. So utterly groundless is it that if seriously uttered it becomes a brazen affront to intelligent men.

Relief from the recent financial depression came largely from the unexpected and unprecedented output of gold from the Klondike, Cripple Creek, and South Africa, which has added to the world's supply more than $300,000,000 of gold, an amount greater than the combined yield of both gold and silver for any previous year in the world's history.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury says:

The amount of gold and silver coin and certificates, United States notes, and national bank notes in circulation November 1, 1899, was $1,963,716,148, which gives us, with an estimated population of 76,600,000, a per capita circulation of $25.00—which, according to the same authority, is a much larger per capita circulation than in 1896. With this increased circulation has come proportionate prosperity, but neither for the increased circulation nor the consequent increased prosperity is the Republican party in anywise responsible.

The Republican financial policy contributed nothing to the discovery of the gold fields of Alaska, Cripple Creek, or South Africa. What had the Republican party to do with the seasonable sunshine and rain which gave the farmers their late bounteous harvests? Without these agencies, which came from the generous hand of a beneficent Providence to the relief of a suffering people, the conditions which prevailed in 1896 would now be so intensified that throughout this land anarchy and revolution would stalk uncovered in public places.

While there are, under existing conditions, undeniable evidences of reviving prosperity, yet the Republican party, true to its instincts and inclination for scarce and consequently dear money—which means hard times and low prices, affluence for the rich and oppression for the masses—will foist this bill upon the country, the inevitable effects of which will be to decrease the volume of money to the extent of the ultimate retirement of the greenbacks, Treasury notes, silver certificates, and silver dollars, aggregating the vast sum of about $1,000,000,000.

It is urged, it is true, that national bank notes will be issued to take the place of the currency so retired. Without entering upon a discussion of the charitableness, benevolence, or fair dealing of national banks in their relation to and dealings with the public in financial matters, suffice it to say that it is always unwise and never expedient to lodge with individuals or corporations the power to thus expand or contract at will the volume of the currency. The granting of such power deliberately places the hands of such corporations or individuals upon the throat of the body politic. The power that controls the volume of money of any nation controls its destinies. In respect to national banks this bill contemplates a money trust more gigantic and potential than any trust heretofore conceived. The power to issue money, which is peculiarly a governmental function, should never and of right can not be delegated to the banks; yet this is the purpose of this bill.

Instead of protecting the gold reserve in the National Treasury this bill provides additional means whereby the gold reserve may be depleted. The payment of national bonds, principal and interest, must now be paid in gold, the option secured in the original contract to the Government to pay in coin having been transferred by this bill to the bondholders, who may now demand payment in gold.

The effect of this bill in making our national bonds payable in gold instead of coin means many millions of money to the holders of such bonds, gratuitously presented by their ever obedient servants—the Republican party. It will be remembered that on February 8, 1895, President Cleveland, in a message to the Congress calling attention to our financial condition and advising measures for "reinforcing and maintaining in our Treasury an adequate and safe gold reserve," asked Congress to issue "in lieu of the 4 per cent coin bonds, other bonds in terms payable in gold and bearing only 3 per cent interest," stating as an inducement that "in the agreement just concluded (between the President and 'parties abundantly able to fulfill their undertaking') the annual saving in interest to the Government, if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege reserved would be $539,159 annually, amounting in thirty years, or at maturity, to $16,174,770." It is needless to add that the Democratic Congress refused to comply with this request.

The obvious effect of this bill will be to enhance in the same ratio the now outstanding interest-bearing indebtedness of the country, which indebtedness was, October 31, 1899, $1,046,049,020. Taking into consideration the different rates of interest and different dates at which these bonds mature, it is a conservative estimate to say that the enhanced value of these bonds upon the passage of this bill will be $150,000,000, and that magnificent sum represents the Christmas gift presented to the bondholders by the Republican party at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. That is, more specifically, to say, that it will require after the passage of this bill the additional amount of $150,000,000 worth of labor or the products of labor to pay those bonds than would have been required to pay them before.

Divide this sum of $150,000,000 by the estimated population and we find that it amounts, in round numbers, to $2 per capita or $10 to each family in the United States.

Since by the provisions of this bill silver dollars, silver certificates, greenbacks, and Treasury notes may be taken to the Treasury and gold demanded for them, the reserve fund may be readily reduced below the required amount, which would, as heretofore, destroy confidence and precipitate financial panic. The fact that the balance of trade is in our favor affords little protection, since the truth is that notwithstanding the large balances in our favor which have existed for some years past, yet our exportations of gold have been generally largely in excess of our importations, and in hard times have reached enormous figures. Taking, for instance, the year 1896, we exported $78,000,000 more of gold than we imported, and then the balance of trade was $102,000,000 in our favor.

Another objectionable feature of this bill, sufficient of itself to eternally damn it in the estimation of the intelligent masses of the American people, is that provision whereby the Secretary of the Treasury is clothed with absolute authority to issue and sell bonds of the United States at his pleasure. This officer, who is appointed by the President, is far removed from the people and is in a large measure absolutely independent of them; may at his pleasure, without let or hindrance, increase the nation's bonded indebtedness ad libitum. And the debt or debts thus created shall be paid, principal and interest, in gold, earned in the sweat and toil, principally, of the common people of the land—those who bear, as they have ever borne, an unjust proportion of the burden of taxation, who produce the nation's wealth in times of peace, and defend the honor of its flag in times of war.

Mr. Chairman, this bill precipitates a second battle of the standards. That gallant champion of the true principles of good government and the rights of the people, William Jennings Bryan, will again be the captain of our forces. Although in 1896 he was temporarily defeated, yet he went down before the guns of the enemy carrying with him, absolutely unscathed, his honor and his flag; but after the greater conflict of 1900, with banner proudly streaming in the breeze and victory written upon its ample folds, he will mount over the prostrate form of Republicanism into the Presidency.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, there appeared in the Washington Post of the 13th the following:

BRYAN ON THE GOLD BILL.—SAYS THE FINANCIAL MEASURE IS VERY BAD AND SHOULD NOT BE PASSED.

AUSTIN, TEX., December 15.

In an interview to-day William Jennings Bryan expressed himself upon the financial bill now before the House. He said: "Following in the line of the President's message, Congress is at present considering a bill that is an extremely bad measure. I refer to the financial bill now under discussion in the House. This bill is a very bad one, indeed. It is a part of the gold-standard people's plan, and I hope that it will be defeated. It should certainly never be permitted to pass the House, because it is not in the interest of Democracy."

It is headed "Bryan on the gold bill." "Says the financial measure is very bad and should not be passed"—a very natural and proper heading and comment. On Thursday last in course of, indeed at the beginning, of his speech the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] quoted only the last sentence of this supposed interview and said, "We had better discuss the effect of this bill on the country rather than its effect on the Republican or Democratic party," which clearly shows the gentleman misconstrued the word "Democracy" as applied here, even if the interview had been genuine, and it is not, as I shall show. On yesterday a further misconstruction of the same sentence was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZIEL], who neither read nor quoted the whole supposed interview, but contented himself in referring to it in this erroneous and partisan manner.

The real reason, the true reason, why you gentlemen are opposed to this bill has been stated in a sentence by that gentleman who has so successfully made demagoguery a profession as a means of livelihood; who from his wanderings out in Texas has said, "This bill ought not to pass because it is not in the interest of the Democratic party." [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the only reason that has been assigned against this bill, assigned by your leader, whose high ideal, I trust, you appreciate. What an inspiring leadership that must be! A great question, affecting the financial standing of the United States and its citizens, to be voted down because it is not in the interest of the Democratic party!

To settle the matter I sent to-day the following message:

WASHINGTON, December 16, 1899.

Hon. W. J. BRYAN, Austin, Tex.:

Wire your interview on House currency bill few days ago; application of term "Democracy" being perverted here.

JNO. W. GAINES.

AUSTIN, TEX., December 16, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES, Washington, D. C.:

Have seen report in morning paper, but do not recall any interviews which is the language criticised. Have said that bill is bad in every particular and should be defeated, but have not said that it would hurt the Democratic party or Democracy; believe it will injure the country, and it ought to drive out of the Republican party all sincere believers in bimetalism.

W. J. BRYAN.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Ah, gentlemen, you may laugh at his righteous condemnation of this unprecedented measure, but in this House in '95 you applauded his patriotic and withering onslaught on Mr. Cleveland's measure to issue $62,500,000 gold bonds, claiming, as he did, though erroneously, that it would save to the Government $16,000,000, but here you are now passing a gold measure actually giving untold millions to "syndicates" whom you denounced in 1895 as robbers.

Mr. Chairman, in 1895 Mr. Bryan stood on the floor of this House and opposed the issuing of gold bonds. He stood then where the genuine Democrat stands to-day. He stands to-day where the Republicans in this House do not stand. He stood then where, in 1895, the distinguished occupant of the chair [Mr. HEPBURN] stood, and your distinguished colleagues, the present Speaker, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. DOLLIVER and Mr. LACEY stood, opposing gold bonds. He stood then where the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] stood, opposed to gold bonds; where the distinguished gentlemen from Minnesota [Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. McCLEARY, and Mr. TAWNEY] stood, opposed to gold bonds; where the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] stood, opposed to gold bonds; where the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and his colleagues [Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. HITT] stood, opposed to gold bonds; where the distinguished gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW, Mr. MAHON, and Mr. ROBBINS] stood, opposed to gold bonds; indeed, where every patriotic citizen, I believe, who was in the House at that time stood—against the issuance of gold bonds. And yet to-day we find these gentlemen deriding the position that this distinguished son of Nebraska has taken against this gold bill, and are themselves ready with the balance on that side to vote Monday, horse, foot, dragons, for gold bonds now and hereafter. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

traction of the currency to the extent of $482,000,000. He answered that it would not; that for the money that went into the Treasury the gold which went out would take its place in circulation. It seems to me that such an answer could not deceive anyone, and yet it drew applause from the Republican side of the House. Where on earth can the money be obtained to redeem the $482,000,000 unless the Treasurer has withdrawn it from circulation? When you take into consideration that $346,000,000 can likewise be redeemed under the bill and $89,000,000 of Treasury notes can be redeemed under the bill, making a total of $918,000,000, to say that that money can be redeemed and it does not contract the currency, when we know the currency must be contracted by the withdrawal of the gold in circulation for the purposes of making redemption, seems to make it plain and clear.

I asked the gentleman another question: Whether or not the double contraction would not occur in the event that this option to redeem in gold is exercised. I asked him whether, when there was a foreign demand for gold, the gold you drew from the Treasury would not be shipped to foreign countries and taken from the circulation, and he said that it would only occur in Democratic days, and there was no danger of that. The state of the European market to-day is such that not only gold is threatened to be expressed from this country, but the papers of this morning tell the story that there have been millions of dollars withdrawn from the subtreasury in New York for the purpose of shipping to Europe upon the Lucania, which sails to-day.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I had expected that somebody on the other side would occupy five minutes in closing the debate, and that this side would have the same length of time, but it seems that an arrangement is made whereby there shall be five minutes on this side and fifteen minutes on the other side. Perhaps that is on the theory that three times as much time is needed on that side as on this, and if that is the theory we will not dispute it.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that there would be sufficient progress made on this bill, and some disposition on the other side to permit amendments, or some amendments, that might be offered, but we are still on the first section. It is very evident that the gentlemen on that side who control the affairs of the committee, as well as those of the House, either are entirely content with the bill or fear that they may be unable to hold their own forces in line if an opportunity be given to vote upon amendments.

It is believed here (I will not say what is believed on the other side) that the deliberate purpose of this bill is to create a huge, far-reaching, all-pervading bank trust. The less discussion about that the better for those who propose it. Since the bill was brought forward as the measure of the agents of the banks, I had thought to offer an amendment which I will ask the Clerk to read, but not in the expectation that the gentlemen on the other side will vote for it or permit a vote to be taken upon it, because it might defeat the purpose which they have in view. I propose to offer this amendment to the eighth section, which has not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read in the gentleman's time for information:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following at the end of section 8:

"And provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any bank organized or doing business under this act, and for each and every officer, director, stockholder, employee, and agent of any such bank or banks, either directly or indirectly, to combine, cooperate, confederate, or collude, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, with any other bank or banks, or with any officer, director, stockholder, employee, or agent thereof, to increase or decrease the amount of coin or currency at any time in circulation, or to call in loans, restrict credit, or increase interest, or to put Government bonds or other securities upon the market, or to force or induce any issue of bonds by the United States or any officer thereof, or to depreciate in public estimation or in commerce or exchange any money of the coinage of the United States, or any currency issued by the United States, or any bond or bonds of the United States; and each and every person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not more than ten years and shall be fined not to exceed $10,000; and each and every bank which, by any of its officers, directors, stockholders, employees, or agents shall be guilty of a violation of any of the foregoing provisions of this section, shall thereby forfeit its charter, and such forfeiture shall be declared by the Comptroller of the Currency, and the affairs of such bank shall be wound up under the provisions of existing law governing national banks, which are hereby made applicable to such cases."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, an amendment something like that might be out of harmony with the bill. It certainly would tend to prevent, and I hope might prevent, the combinations for the creation of which, for the operation of which, for the fruition of which, I believe, and we believe, this bill is designed. If the purpose is not to give over control of the currency of the country to the national banks, and not merely to national banks individually, but to the aggregation of national banks, to the head center and chief director or dictator of the national banks, for the benefit of the banks and the Republican party, such an amendment ought not to be objectionable.

The Government is to issue no more currency; the national banks are to issue it all, and not a solitary check is put upon them by this bill. They can combine, they can confederate, they can do anything they please, so long as they operate in the joint interest of themselves and the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the time on the opposite side of the Chamber if any gentleman over there desires to be heard any further? I take it that this side has the right to the closing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I answer very positively that that side has the right to five minutes, but the gentleman is seeking to get fifteen minutes, and I have informed him an objection would be made to that. Now let the debate proceed under the rule. I demand the regular order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think that throughout a week's discussion, under what all members must concede to have been a very equitable distribution of the time—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, there is no complaint. We are perfectly satisfied with that. We only want to proceed under the rule of five-minute debate; that is all we ask. We are perfectly satisfied.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask, for information, whether or not an amendment is going to be offered providing for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand the regular order, Mr. Chairman. I do not know how the gentleman can make such a request as that under the guise of a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman claims the floor the Chair knows of no rule by which he can be compelled to take it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not understand the suggestion of the Chair. I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House, if no gentleman wishes to speak.

Mr. PAYNE. The next thing in order is the reading of the next section.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to entertain the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The whole effort is to enable one gentleman who is hoping to get fifteen minutes in which to close the debate to do so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. PAYNE. The regular order is the reading of the next section.

The CHAIRMAN. If any gentleman claims the floor on this side, he will be recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is recognized. [Cries of "Read!"]

Mr. GROSVENOR. When I get through with the few able remarks I have to make, then the Clerk can read.

Mr. Chairman, at the time we entered upon this discussion there was a fear expressed on the other side of the House that there would not be time enough to discuss the merits of the bill under consideration. We are rapidly approaching the end of a whole week devoted to this discussion.

We added to the time provided in the rule three hours of additional debate by meeting an hour earlier each day, and we also adopted night sessions, and there has been a large volume of debate. Now, the real question between the two sides is, upon the one side, the adoption of the gold standard, and upon the other side, the question of free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Now, I say with all sincerity, and at this late hour truth compels me to say that there has been mighty little advocacy of the free and unlimited coinage of silver on that side, and I begin to have the fear that in some way, by some devious process, the Democratic party is about to rehabilitate itself, to reorganize itself, and take up a new position in national politics.

I have seen the signs coming, and warned the gentleman from Tennessee that he would have as much as he could do to hold together his cohorts. I fear, and I am sincere in that statement, that there is a disposition to slightly pass over this burning question of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Is it possible that in six days' time no man has presented a serious argument in favor of the future adoption of such a proposition as that?

I fear that a close examination of the RECORD will show that nothing of the kind has really been done. Just reconsider our debate. We have had the gentleman from Missouri, one gentleman from Missouri to-day, who has discussed the whole field of personal politics, and did it well, did it beautifully, and did it so well that I think it would be a good substitute for the platform of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the next election, if he could just be heard all the time, to deaden the memory of the people of the United States upon this question. [Laughter.]

And then came another gentleman from Missouri, late this afternoon, and he came into the field of American politics and got down to a description of the personal appearance of the Representatives on this side. I never retaliate when anybody makes a personal assault upon my personal appearance.

I know how distinguished and handsome I look [laughter], but if I were going to retaliate in kind, I would say, "I thank God, when a man looks at me, he is not reminded of that familiar sign, the skull and crossbones and death head on a poison jar in an apothecary shop." [Laughter and applause.] And I further rejoice that when he hears the sound of my voice he would not really think it is such a voice as suggested to the poet:

Hark, from the tombs a doleful sound,
Mine ears attend the cry.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, out of this debate, in my judgment, has come a settled conviction on both sides of this House that the enactment of this measure into law, or something equivalent to it, will be but putting into a printed page of our statute books the policy that has governed and guided this country for nearly thirty years of administration, and that in doing this act the representatives of the American people will but heed the voice of the American people and do an act which will be declared an act well done by our masters who sent us here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not exactly understand what was said by the gentleman from Ohio and some remarks made by gentlemen on the other side. Here we are at the close of this debate. The gentleman from Ohio, I think, says that he has not heard the free coinage of silver discussed on this side of the House. If he has not heard it discussed on this side of the House, it is simply because he has not been in his seat. Some of the ablest speeches that I have heard in the House have been made advocating that proposition.

But, Mr. Chairman, only one single section of this bill has yet been considered. The gentlemen in control of that side of the House have not perfected this bill. They have had read only a single, solitary section of the bill under the five-minute rule. Gentlemen did not want any amendment offered. The iron-clad rule precludes the offering of amendments from this side of the House for the free coinage of silver as a substitute to this bill. The gentleman himself in charge of the bill has not intended to have this bill read by sections in order that each section might be open for amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing). Because the gentleman knows that under the rule at any stage of debate after we have entered upon debate under the five-minute rule on any one section it was in order to close debate, and bring us to a vote upon the section, so that other sections could be considered.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman yield to a question? Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not sought the floor at this late hour to offer an amendment. I want to answer what has been said. How could I offer an amendment? I have not had any opportunity to do so. The express terms of the rules would prevent me from doing so. We sought an opportunity through the Committee on Rules (that is, the minority members of it) at the beginning of this matter, when the special rule was adopted, to allow us to have an opportunity to offer amendments and a substitute.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not yield now.

Mr. DALZELL. I will take my own time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You can take your own time. If the gentleman had intended to consider proper amendments on any subject he could have stopped this debate at any point after we had entered upon the debate under the five-minute rule and could have brought us to a vote. And, Mr. Chairman, if he had desired, if he had wished to have brought the committee to a vote upon any section of this bill he could have done so; and he knows it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Your amendment is in order now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have offered no amendment now. I have no amendment that I desire to offer to this section. But why did you not have debate closed and proceed to the consideration of other sections, where we might offer amendments?

Mr. DALZELL. Why do not you have debate closed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DR. ARMOND] has just stated that he desires to offer an amendment, but to a subsequent section in this bill, and it would not be in order to offer it now, and the gentleman well knows it would not. He has conducted the debate premeditatedly and deliberately for the purpose of preventing amendments being offered to the subsequent portions of this bill [applause on the Democratic side], and the gentleman will not deny it. At one time this morning he did arise and suggest that we close debate upon the first section of the bill, but he did not press it.

Consultations were held on the floor, and while I am not prepared to say, because I did not hear the result of the conversation, I judge from the results that the gentleman was dissuaded from his effort to get a vote on the section, and he has sat in his seat and permitted the debate upon one section of the bill to run through five long hours, and then comes in a hypocritical way—for it is hypocritical on that side of the House—and says "You can offer an amendment to some section of this bill."

It is too cheap, gentlemen, and it is beneath the dignity of a great political party. You did not intend to give us that opportunity. You tied our hands in the beginning by your cast-iron rule, and you tied them premeditatedly, and you have accomplished your purpose. We would have been glad to see some modification of the rule. You shaped the rule as you wanted it in the beginning. The gentleman from Ohio says we have not discussed the free coinage of silver. The question in this bill was not the free coinage of silver, but the establishment of the gold standard. When you accomplish that you destroy bimetalism in every form, and that is the end of free coinage of silver at any ratio.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust no member of this committee will be misled by the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that this rule prevents the offering of amendments. On the contrary, it was in the power of any gentleman on that side of the House, at any time to-day, to call for the reading of the next paragraph and to offer an amendment, and when the gentleman stands in his place and talks about hypocrisy, I hurl back the charge, and I say that you did not dare, you dare not now, you would not if you had the opportunity, rise in your place, any man on that side of the Chamber, and risk a vote upon a proposition to amend this bill and provide for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no man on that side of the House so much of a leader that he dare to rally his cohorts to follow him by an affirmative vote upon that proposition.

Mr. HILL. And the first section is the place to do it.

Mr. LOLLIVER. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that our week's controversy about this bill—

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I have an amendment, which I prepared as long ago as last night, to section 10, and I have been at my desk all day seeking an opportunity for—

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not yield for that purpose, but I will yield and ask unanimous consent for any gentleman to offer an amendment in favor of the 16 to 1 proposition.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We challenge the gentleman from Iowa to ask unanimous consent for that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I yield the floor for the purpose of any gentleman offering an amendment of that nature.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to offer that amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We all join in it.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I ask consent to offer an amendment for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SULZER. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. I ask to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. Gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will first be in order. Gentlemen must take their seats.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I think I have the floor to offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York does not have the floor. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has asked unanimous consent to so change the order as to admit of offering an amendment to this bill providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver—

Mr. SULZER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will take his seat while the Chair is stating the proposition. The gentleman from Texas knows, I think, that this committee has no power to modify or change an order of the House. [Derisive cries on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOLLIVER rose.

Mr. SULZER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has the floor.

Mr. SULZER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I understood—

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SULZER. One moment: wait until I state it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has the floor.

Mr. SULZER. We were challenged to offer a bimetallic amendment. I have offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will take his seat. The Sergeant-at-Arms will seat the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. I called the bluff. [Laughter.]

The Sergeant-at-Arms bearing the mace appeared, and Mr. SULZER took his seat.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to ask the Chair whether, in the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from Indiana understood beforehand that that was parliamentary law, and that you were compelled to rule that way under the special rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman knows that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But it is a very good one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has the floor.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will only say in yielding the floor for the purpose of allowing the committee to rise that as soon as the House resumes its session the opportunity will be given to these gentlemen both to offer that amendment and to vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, and that being the hour fixed for the rising of the committee, the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a typographical error in the bill may be corrected. I refer to the word "July," in line 7, section 10, in the bill, on page 8. It should be "June." It is a mere reference to a law now in existence.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LENTZ. I should like to know whether it is now in order to offer an amendment to section 10 to provide that any individual as well as association may offer bonds and receive currency for them.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. LENTZ. And if not in order, when will it be?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Ohio that that will not be in order.

Mr. OVERSTREET rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] was on his feet. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask unanimous consent that the rule under which we are now operating may be considered as amended to the extent that an amendment may be offered and voted upon providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. [Applause.]

Mr. DRIGGS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] asks unanimous consent that the rule under which the House is operating may be amended so as to permit the offering of an amendment to provide for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Is there objection?

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, when the Greeks offer me jewels, I object, and I object now.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry—

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, in accordance with the rule under which we are operating, the House stands adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 18, 1899.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN F. HURST, D. D., bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last; when, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

LEASING OF PUBLIC PROPERTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, a report relative to the leasing by the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, for a period not exceeding five years, of such unoccupied and unproductive property of the United States under his control for the leasing of which there is no authority under existing law; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, in further compliance with a resolution of January 27, 1898, together with a communication from Col. Theodore A. Bingham, Corps of Engineers, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds of the city of Washington, together with a list of lots in the District of Columbia sold by the United States, covering the squares numbering from 247 to 760, inclusive; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF CRIMINAL LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a letter from the Commission to Revise and Codify the Criminal Laws of the United States, together with a report made by the commission under the act approved March 3, 1899; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL PRISON COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting the report of the Hon. Samuel J. Barrows, commissioner for the United States on the International Prison Commission, on "crimes, misdemeanors, and penalties" in the United States, etc.; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the communication, with the accompanying papers, will be ordered to be printed, and the Chair judges that the communication should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. Should not the papers go to the Committee on Printing before the order is made to print them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the rule, but it is a rule which can be laid aside by unanimous consent. The Chair put it in that form—if there was no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Chair have stated again the substance of the communication?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the communication.

The communication was again read.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to the printing of the communication, but there may be very lengthy documents accompanying it which should not be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are a large number of papers.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the communication and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no necessity for such a motion. If the Senator objects to the printing, they will go to the Committee on Printing under the rules. That order will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents resolutions adopted at a public meeting in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that they be read.

Mr. HALE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions are very short.

Mr. HALE. How do the resolutions come before the Senate? Are they in the form of a memorial?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are directed to the President pro tempore of the Senate as a memorial to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. It is in the nature of a memorial?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is in the nature of a petition, I understand. As it is brief, I ask that it be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico, as follows:

To the President of the United States Senate:

At a public meeting of the citizens of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, held on July 4, 1899, to celebrate the one hundred and twenty-third anniversary of the declaration of American independence, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted, viz:

Whereas under and by virtue of the joint resolution of annexation the Hawaiian Islands have been annexed as a part of the territory of the United States and are now subject to the sovereign dominion thereof; and

Whereas the said resolution further provides that the municipal legislation of the Hawaiian Islands not inconsistent therewith nor contrary to the Constitution of the United States shall remain in force until the Congress of the United States shall otherwise determine; and

Whereas by the failure of the last Congress of the United States to enact necessary legislation at its late session much uncertainty exists as to the present status of the Hawaiian Islands in their relation to the Government, Constitution, and laws of the United States; and

Whereas this is deemed a fitting occasion for a public expression of opinion on the matter: Now, therefore, it is

Resolved, That this assemblage earnestly and respectfully asks of President McKinley and his advisers and the Congress of the United States to take such action as will cause the speedy extension of American Territorial laws to Hawaii.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Signed on behalf of citizens as above.

GEORGE W. SMITH,
Chairman of Public Meeting.
B. HAYWOOD WRIGHT,
Secretary.

HONOLULU, HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, November 23, A. D. 1899.

Mr. FORAKER presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of Holland-American citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the extension to the Government of Great Britain and to those of the South African Republics of our good offices in the interests of peace; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McMILLAN presented sundry petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR presented the memorial of Henry S. Mackintosh and 207 other citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against any extension of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands, in any event, and over any other foreign territory without the free consent of the people thereof; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. QUARLES presented the petitions of Rev. James Churm and 56 other citizens of Waupun, of N. Matteson and sundry other citizens of Clintonville, M. C. Miner and 13 other citizens of Evansville, Mrs. Ellen S. Gray and 26 other citizens, of B. F. Hanks and 88 other inmates of the Wisconsin Veterans' Home, of Wapaca; J. T. Kidder and 41 other citizens of Ripon, L. E. Osgood and 112 other citizens of Sturgeon Bay, J. K. Kilbourne and 24 other citizens of Pewaukee, and of the Wells Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Racine, all in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented the petition of Rev. Thomas H. Drake and 49 other citizens of Oakland City, Ind., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the Pacific Slope, remonstrating against the proposed reduction of duty upon prunes, nuts, preserved fruits, olive oil, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Corning, Lodi, Oakland, Lone City, Merino, Armada, Elsinore, and Willard, all in the State of California, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Santa Ana, Cal., remonstrating against the ratification of the so-called Jamaica treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Manufacturers and Producers' Association of California, remonstrating against the ratification of the reciprocity treaties between the United States and France and Jamaica; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HANNA presented the petitions of Mathias Denton and sundry other citizens of Lancaster, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a per diem pension law; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MASON. I desire to present a number of petitions. I do not ask to have them published in the RECORD, except the heading of the first petition, taking not over a quarter of a column of printed matter. As it is reported to me, there are several hundred thousand signatures to the petitions I present, and they come from different parts of the United States. I was asked to introduce the petitions and have them referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, although the petitions are in form addressed to the President of the United States. I called the attention of my correspondent to this fact, and he said that others would be presented to the President, and he asked to have all these presented to the Senate and referred.

Mr. HALE. What are the petitions about? The Senator has not stated the purport of the petitions.

Mr. MASON. They are petitions expressing sympathy with the continued life of the South African Republic. I will not stop the Senate to have them read, but I ask that a copy of the first heading be printed in the RECORD, and that it and all the rest be sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations for information.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the matter indicated was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the President of the United States.

Sir: The undersigned, without regard to party, respectfully represent that Great Britain is trying to force upon our sister Republic—the South African Republic—the granting of naturalization and the right to vote to Uitlanders—that is, to foreigners—without the latter forswearing their original allegiance.

We protest against the United States, because of any sentimental or real "Anglo-American alliance," or for any reason, being placed in the position of endorsing the aforesaid action of Great Britain or of giving even moral support to any course of action that is wrong.

Such aid and support in this instance would amount to national suicide.

England has no right to interfere with the internal autonomy of the South African Republic.

Our great country must not forget Washington's advice to "observe good faith and justice toward all nations" (which includes the poor little South African Republic), and, further, that "against the insidious wiles of foreign influence the jealousy of a free people ought to be awake."

We fear that the violation of Democratic-Republican principles involved in aiding and countenancing England's oppression of the Boers will some time react to the injury of our own country.

And we are unwilling that our great country should, for any advantage however great, condescend to do wrong.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of G. M. Parker and sundry other citizens of Gorham, Me., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition signed by Hon. George B. Myers, the county officials, and other citizens of Bollinger County, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation giving to various Missouri militia organizations a pensionable status; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON presented petitions of 38 citizens of Leigh, 25 citizens of North Bend, 19 citizens of Atkinson, 22 citizens of Indiana, 11 citizens of Lincoln, 66 citizens of Sutton, 15 citizens of Norfolk, 17 citizens of Hartwell, and of 95 citizens of Omaha, all in the State of Nebraska, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GEAR presented a petition of 75 citizens of Iowa, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOLCOTT presented sundry petitions of citizens of Colorado, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of Rev. H. W. Conley and 5 other citizens of Bristol and Walpole, in the State of Maine, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENLISTMENT IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE presented a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, relative to enlistment in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to accompany the bill S. 1631, and ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS BY NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. HALE presented a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, relative to the adoption of certain amendments to the act of January 25, 1895, authorizing certain officers of the Navy and Marine Corps to administer oaths; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to accompany the bill S. 1632, and ordered to be printed.

CONSOLIDATION OF BUREAUS IN NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE presented a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, relative to the consolidation of the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering and Equipment, and to provide for the distribution of the duties thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to accompany the bill S. 1630, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 762) granting settlers the right to make second homestead entries, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 718) to authorize the President of the United States to cause certain lands heretofore withdrawn from market for reservoir purposes to be restored to the public domain, subject to entry under the homestead law with certain restrictions, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MCBRIDE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 386) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

EXAMINATION OF MONTHLY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I report back favorably, from the Committee on Military Affairs, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 4152) to extend the time for examination of monthly accounts by bureaus and offices of the War Department. It is a bill of considerable importance, and I am instructed to ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. HALE. It is a House bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a House bill that has just come over. It is recommended by the Secretary of War, the Quartermaster-

General, the Commissary-General, the Inspector-General, the Paymaster-General, the Surgeon-General, the Chief of Engineers, the Chief of Ordnance, and the Chief Signal Officer. The law requires that accounts of disbursing officers shall be examined within twenty days and sent over to the Auditor. You can imagine that with the enormous quantity of reports of disbursing officers it is impossible to get hold of those from Manila, Puerto Rico, and so on, and dispose of them within twenty days and give them the examination that is required before they are sent to the Auditor. The present law has been extended two or three times. This bill gives another extension. The present extension expires on the 4th of January next, and the War Department is very anxious to have a new extension. I ask that the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for examination of monthly accounts by the bureaus and offices of the War Department after the date of actual receipt and before transmitting the same to the Auditor for the War Department, as limited by section 12 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved July 31, 1894, is hereby extended from twenty days to sixty days for the period of one year from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will just read a word or two showing the necessity for the passage of the bill:

If we do not pass this bill the paymasters, the quartermasters, the commissaries, and all their bureaus will be held up until the accounts for the current month are passed. The Auditor for the War Department has notified the War Department that he will insist on a strict compliance with the twenty-day law. So unless we pass this bill it will be impossible for the paymaster to pay a regiment; it will be impossible for the commissary to furnish food; it will be impossible for the paymaster to furnish a tent or supplies of any kind until his accounts for that current month are passed.

It is a mere matter of form, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I introduce by request a bill authorizing the Delaware Indians in the Cherokee Nation to bring suit in the Court of Claims. I have not examined the bill enough to say whether I approve of it or not, and I wish it to be noted that I introduce it by request.

The bill (S. 1742) to authorize the Delaware Indians in the Cherokee Nation to bring suit in the Court of Claims against the United States, and the Mississippi Choctaws to sue the Choctaw Nation, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I introduce by request, without committing myself to its provisions, another bill.

The bill (S. 1743) to establish a division in the Treasury Department for the regulation of insurance among the several States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1744) for the relief of the Atlantic Works, of Boston, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1745) granting a pension to Patrick Moran; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 1746) to provide for the inspection of the boilers of the Alvena and Ailsa; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. This is to take the place of a bill formerly introduced by me. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 1747) to change the name of the "Potomac Insurance Company of Georgetown," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TURNER introduced a bill (S. 1748) to pay Carlos W. Shane for services rendered in the winter of 1847 and 1848 in the first Cayuse war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1749) for the payment to Joshua T. Roberts of balance due for surveying public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1750) to correct the military record of George Haskin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1751) for the relief of Thomas Waterworth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

- A bill (S. 1752) for the relief of James J. Wheeler;
- A bill (S. 1753) granting a pension to Lieut. Col. Ogden Street;
- A bill (S. 1754) granting a pension to Burton Packard;
- A bill (S. 1755) granting a pension to John M. Core;
- A bill (S. 1756) granting an increase of pension to Amos P. Curry;

A bill (S. 1757) to increase the pension of Samuel Hamilton; and

A bill (S. 1758) to increase the pension of Farnham J. Eastman. Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 1759) for the relief of William A. Richards, late surveyor-general of Wyoming; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 1766) to restore the annuities of the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians and of the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux Indians, otherwise known as the Santee Sioux Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1767) authorizing the cession of certain Sioux Indian land; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1768) pertaining to and regulating certain additional fees to be allowed to registers and receivers of United States land offices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1769) granting an increase of pension to Henry Frank; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1770) to provide for the acquisition, purchase, construction, and condemnation by the United States of America of railroads lying in the Territories of the United States, the respective States, and the District of Columbia engaged in interstate commerce in carrying the mails, and to provide for the operation of said roads by the United States, and amending the act of Congress of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate interstate commerce," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to say in this connection that the bill has been prepared with considerable care, and that I was assisted in its preparation by David Lewis, a lawyer of Cumberland, Md., who is a very able investigator and writer upon this and kindred subjects. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I hope very much that the committee will take the matter up. I wish to secure a report, either favorable or adverse, upon it during the present session of Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to have printed the paper which I send to the desk, to accompany a bill which I introduced this morning for the Government ownership of the railroads of the United States. The document which I wish to have printed is a speech delivered by Judge Walter Clark, of North Carolina, before the national convention of railroad commissioners at Denver last summer. I ask unanimous consent for the printing of the document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the printing of a document which he has sent to the desk and explained. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. QUARLES introduced a bill (S. 1771) granting a pension to Ellie Kee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 1772) for the payment of the claim of M. M. Deerees for the construction of a sewer adjacent to the lands of the United States known as the "Arsenal

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 1864) for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin Wilson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 1865) for the relief of Lewis B. Brasher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 41) for the relief of August Bolton, of New York City, and Gustave Richelieu, of Boston, Mass., American seamen; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 42) authorizing the purchase of a bust of Justin S. Morrill and of Daniel W. Voorhees for the building of the Library of Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MASON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 43) granting a life-saving medal of the first class to Lieut. Fidelio S. Carter, of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO COMMODORE SCHLEY AND OTHERS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read at length and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. R. 44) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Winfield S. Schley, United States Navy, and to the officers and men of the squadron under his command, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress and the American people are hereby tendered to Commodore Winfield S. Schley, of the United States naval force operating against the Spanish forces in Cuban waters, for highly distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy, as displayed by him in the destruction of the Spanish fleet off the harbor of Santiago, Cuba, July 3, 1898.

Sec. 2. That the thanks of Congress and the American people are hereby extended, through Commodore Schley, to the officers and men under his command for the gallantry and skill exhibited by them on that occasion.

Sec. 3. That the President of the United States be requested to cause this resolution to be communicated to Commodore Schley, and, through him, to the officers and men under his command.

Mr. HALE. The joint resolution should be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution has been twice read; and if there be no objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offered a similar resolution at the last session, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and, I think, has never been reported back. I supposed, of course, at this new session of Congress the resolution would have to be again introduced in order to receive the consideration of that committee, and I reintroduce it for that purpose.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. BACON. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read in full and then lie upon the table subject to call hereafter.

The joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of war, the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

Second. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States or to permanently incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government; and the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands.

Third. That the United States having accepted the cession of the Philippine Islands from Spain, and having by force of arms overthrown all organized authority and opposition to the authority of the United States therein, the duty and obligation rest upon the United States to restore peace and maintain order throughout the same; to protect in said islands the enjoyment of life and property and the pursuit of lawful avocations; and to continue such protection until the power and duty to maintain said protection shall have been transferred and intrusted by the United States to a government of the people of said islands deemed capable and worthy to exercise said power and discharge said duty.

Fourth. That when armed resistance to the authority of the United States shall have ceased within said islands and peace and order shall have been restored therein, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, so soon thereafter as the same can be practically and safely accomplished, to provide the opportunity and prescribe the method for the formation of a government by and of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be thereafter independently exercised and controlled by themselves, it being the design of the United States to accord to the people of said islands the same measure of liberty and independence which have been pledged by the Congress of the United States to the people of Cuba.

Fifth. That when a stable government shall, by the method aforesaid, have been duly formed and erected in said islands, competent and worthy in the judgment of the United States to exercise the powers of an independent government and to preserve peace and maintain order within its jurisdiction, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, reserving to themselves only such harbors and tracts of land as may be needed for coaling stations or other governmental purposes, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights and territory secured in said islands under the treaty with Spain, and to thereupon leave the dominion and control of the islands to their people.

Sixth. That when said government has been thus formed and set up in the Philippine Islands and approved by the United States, it is the design and intention of the United States, through treaties with the leading nations of the world, to secure the guaranty of the continued independence of the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks that the joint resolution lie on the table, subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WILLIAM E. WOODBRIDGE.

Mr. KYLE. On December 7 I introduced the bill (S. 794) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of William E. Woodbridge for compensation for the use by the United States of his invention relating to projectiles, for which letters patent were ordered to issue to him March 25, 1852. The bill was referred to the Committee on Claims by mistake. It should have gone to the Committee on Patents. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATEMENT OF SPECIAL PENSIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at my request the Commissioner of Pensions has furnished me with a statement showing the special acts of Congress passed since March 4, 1861, granting pensions to commissioned officers and to the widows of commissioned officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

This statement is very exhaustive and very interesting. It shows the name of the officer or of the widow, the rank and service, the date at which the pension was granted, the rate of the special act, and the rate granted by the general laws, provided any pension had been granted.

I feel sure that this is a statement, Mr. President, that will interest every Senator as well as the country to a considerable extent, and I therefore ask that it be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: Mr. President, a little time ago I presented a statement from the Commissioner of Pensions showing special acts granted from 1861 to the present time to officers and widows of commissioned officers of the Army and Navy and Marine Corps, and asked that it might be printed as a document. Since presenting it the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has suggested to me that it would be well to have this document include all special acts, if any were granted prior to 1861, including all the wars preceding the civil war. Agreeing with the Senator that it would be a wise thing to do, I ask that the document may lie upon the table for the present and not be printed as I requested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The former order will be rescinded, and the document will lie on the table for the present.

REMOVAL OF CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire, as it is somewhat opportune, in connection with the document just presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, to make a brief statement.

On the 6th of this month I introduced a brief bill, the purport of which is "to grant an honorable discharge to all soldiers who were at any time in the actual service of the United States, and who have for more than thirty years been held to be ineligible for such honorable discharge by reason of any charge of desertion which may stand against them."

That bill was handed to me as I came into the Senate. Upon a glance at it I supposed it was probably right, and so I introduced it. However, I had my attention called to its provisions since, and I desire to say that I am not for the bill. I have so notified members of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom it was referred. The understanding, I think, is that the committee will probably report adversely upon it, and I shall be entirely agreeable to that report. The bill is broader than I supposed it was when I introduced it, and really I had not read it except at a glance, as I came in, to know what its provisions were.

I wish to say further that in the same mail I had a number of letters from soldiers who are charged with desertion and whose cases seemed to be very meritorious, and at the time it occurred to me that possibly some general bill might be passed by Congress to give us some relief from the numerous bills which come to us for special relief and relieve meritorious cases. But upon investigation I find the door would be thrown so wide open that it would be very unfair to the Government as well as unfair to the soldiers who had not the charge of desertion against them.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say simply that I believe it was on the same day the Senator from Illinois introduced the bill that he spoke to me about it. He said that he had introduced, by request, the bill, and asked me, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to look into it, and I gave expression to my views, which seemed to be entirely different from what the Senator from Illinois had anticipated. He supposed it was a bill for the relief of real soldiers who were suffering under disabilities with regard to just claims.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator makes the exact statement, and I am very much obliged to him.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Missouri can give me the date, perhaps, but a few years ago we reported a bill and it was passed through both Houses, making very liberal arrangements for relieving soldiers from the charge of desertion. In substance, the bill required that it should be shown there was no purpose really to desert the service.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just as the Senator from Connecticut has said, Congress has been very liberal. We have passed, I think, three separate acts extending the classes of meritorious cases which have been developed from time to time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Leaving it in the discretion of the War Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. Leaving it in the discretion of the War Department. We believe that the laws are amply sufficient now to afford relief to every soldier who was not really a deserter and justly chargeable with desertion, except in a few isolated cases which are exceptional and which the Committee on Military Affairs reports favorably when the case is clearly presented. In the law now existing there is an express provision which bars the bounty jumpers that infested the country and feasted off of it, so that no bounty jumper can, under the existing law, be relieved.

PAYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution: which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved. That the stenographer employed to report the arguments before the Committee on Privileges and Elections concerning the right of Matthew F. Quay to a seat in the Senate from the State of Pennsylvania be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

CLAIMS OF LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. MASON. I submit the following resolution which I send to the desk, together with certain accompanying papers, which I desire to have sent to the Attorney-General with the resolution after it shall have been adopted.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a list showing the amounts which have been reported by the commissioners of the Court of Claims or found by the court as representing services actually performed by letter carriers in excess of eight hours per day under the act of May 24, 1888, entitled, "An act to limit the hours that letter carriers in cities shall be employed per day," but which have been excluded or excepted from judgment for the sole reason that the same were barred by the statute of limitations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois requests that certain papers accompanying the resolution may be referred with the resolution to the Attorney-General. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I offer a resolution which I wish to have read and then lie upon the table. I will call it up at some future time and address the Senate upon it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

First. Resolved, That, in the words of the Declaration of Independence, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Second. That under the Constitution of the United States the Federal Government has no power to rule over colonial dependencies, but it is restricted in its operations to States as integral parts of the Union and to Territories intended for future States.

Third. That the expansion of our commerce has not been and can not be dependent upon the adoption of a policy of imperialism involving the subjugation and annexation of Asiatic colonies, but would in the end be hindered by such a policy.

Fourth. That we are opposed to the retention of the Philippine Islands by the United States, and that it is our purpose to consent to the independence of the Filipinos as soon as a stable government shall be established by them, and toward the prompt establishment of such government we pledge our friendly assistance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the resolution lie upon the table subject to his call.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be printed and lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from South Carolina.

INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Librarian of Congress be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate the sources of information in print in regard to the Nicaragua and other interoceanic canals.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I rose with the question in my mind whether we had authority to direct the Librarian to report to us, but I suppose that we have, and so I make no objection to the resolution. I only suggest that I presume he would furnish the information on the request of any Senator.

Mr. HALE. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that this is an innovation. I do not remember in my service here of the Senate directing the Librarian to furnish information.

The practical trouble would be in the Librarian selecting and discriminating as to what he should transmit to the Senate. The Librarian is the custodian, not of documents and communications relating to a special branch of the Government but of an immense number of books upon an immense number of subjects, and I should think, Mr. President, that it would be better that this resolution should be referred to the Committee on the Library, in order that they may consider how much of a task they shall impose upon the Librarian. Shall the Librarian, under this resolution, begin and study up the subject, read books, and prepare an article and submit to us a thesis upon a certain subject-matter—because, if that is so, that certainly is an innovation—or shall he transmit to us every book from which a citation can be made throwing light upon this subject? That would be an innovation.

The more I think of it as I am speaking, Mr. President, the more it occurs to me that before we do this the resolution should be referred to the Committee on the Library, who may take it and see just what is contemplated, see how it should be restricted in its scope, if necessary, and whether we should begin to embark in inquiries upon the Librarian to furnish us with the knowledge which his books contain upon any particular subject-matter.

Therefore, I hope the Senator who offered the resolution—I do not know who it was—will let it go to the Committee on the Library for that purpose, or otherwise I shall make that motion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not understand that this resolution calls for an article from the Librarian or a discussion upon the subject of canals or the furnishing books or opinions of any kind. I understand that it simply asks the Librarian to give us a list of the works relating to the subject-matter. There is no other way of getting at the bibliography of the subject, so far as we command it in the Library of Congress, except through the Librarian. A list of the works relating to the subject is all, I understand, the resolution calls for. It is simply to make the Library available for Senators and Members of the House of Representatives who desire to get at books relating to that topic. I do not understand that the resolution goes any further than that. If I am wrong, the Senator from Oregon will correct me.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest that the resolution be again read, Mr. President.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that goes very far—all "the sources of information in print." I should think the Senator offering the resolution had better recast it or send it to the Committee on the Library and let them report in connection and in conference with him.

I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, before that is done, I want to make a remark or two. I wish to call the attention of my colleague on the committee to the fact that the late Committee on the Nicaraguan Canal at the last session made a report on all the sources of information—that is to say, all the papers that had their origin in any action of either of the two Houses upon this subject—and that report is in print. Outside of that, of course, there is a very broad, an almost inexhaustible field of literature, which would include, I suppose, the writings of men in all the different enlightened countries of the world, for the subject has been before the world for a couple of centuries. The resolution, it occurs to me, is unnecessarily broad in that particular. I think if the Senator will inquire of the superintendent of the document room and examine that document he will find there a full statement—I think it is complete—of all of the action taken in Congress and all the reports that have been to Congress on the subject of the Nicaraguan Canal. It is quite a complete document, and I think it will answer his purpose if he will take the pains to examine it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to my honorable friend from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] which, I think, will meet everybody's difficulty and answer his purpose, that instead of directing the Librarian of Congress to make this report, we direct the committee on that subject to make that report to the Senate. They can command the services of the Librarian for all purposes that they choose and it will save any difficulty. On any committee of Congress requesting the Librarian to furnish information, he would do so if it were possible. I suggest, therefore, to amend the resolution so as to direct the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to give that information to the Senate and furnish everything that is desired on the subject.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I accept the proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], but I desire to say that I do not accept it because I believe there is any impropriety in the resolution as framed and presented. On the contrary, it is in line with resolutions introduced here day by day calling for information within the power of the officer addressed to give. I see no impropriety whatever in addressing this resolution to and directing the Librarian of Congress to give us a list of the books and documents, so far as he has knowledge, relating to this great subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] accepts the modification of the resolution suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals be, and it is hereby, instructed to report to the Senate the sources of information in print in regard to the Nicaragua and other interoceanic canals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether or not the Librarian of Congress has declined to furnish this information at the personal request of any Senator? I think we are all of us from time to time in the habit of calling upon the Librarian of Congress for information, and I think, no matter who has been the Librarian, we have always found a very quick, ready, and intelligent response to all such requests. If, however, we are going to make this in the nature of an official call, what measure of responsibility is to be attached if the Librarian leaves a book out? It may become a question of how far it is within the line of his public duties to furnish detailed reports upon a resolution of Congress. I ask if this information has been asked for and declined?

Mr. McBRIDE. I take pleasure in saying that I have not asked for the information called for from the Librarian of Congress, nor has he at any time declined to answer a reasonable request.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am very glad to hear that, and I have no objection to this resolution; but at the same time I know the Librarian would with equal readiness furnish any Senator with the same information if it had been personally requested.

Mr. McBRIDE. Permit me to add that the resolution does not imply any delinquency or discourtesy on the part of the Librarian of Congress to any Senator.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest the inquiry, Has this proposition been submitted to the present Librarian or to his experienced predecessor, Mr. Spofford, who is still connected with the Library? I would not think of passing such a resolution without asking them. I understand, however, that this resolution has been referred to the committee.

Mr. McBRIDE. In further answer to the suggestion of my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that this resolution is an innovation, I ask that the letter of transmittal, which I send to the desk, of a list of books relating to Cuba, which was voluntarily sent to Congress by the Librarian of Congress in 1898, be entered in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The letter of transmittal referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 22, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a report containing a list of all the works relative to the island of Cuba, as well as references to collated works and periodicals upon that subject now in the Library of Congress.

Also a bibliography of maps of Cuba now in the department of maps and charts.

The general interest felt in Cuban affairs will, it is believed, give this report special value.

The catalogue of books was prepared by A. P. C. Griffin; the bibliography of the maps by P. Lee Phillips, members of the Library staff.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN RUSSELL YOUNG,
Librarian of Congress.

HON. GEORGE P. WETMORE,
Chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seems to me the method selected by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE] for securing this information is entirely proper. If he had sent a private inquiry to the Librarian he would have had this information; but if the resolution is passed by the Senate the information will be printed and we shall all have it. For my part I should be very glad to receive from the Librarian a list of books in the Library upon this subject, and I think it would be proper to follow this resolution by another asking for a list of all books and documents that are in the Library with regard to the islands we have recently acquired. I hope some Senator will offer such a resolution. I therefore hope that the resolution will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST SPAIN.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to inquire and report to the Senate at an early day the character and conditions of claims by citizens of the United States against the Government of Spain outstanding at the beginning of the late war, and what, if any, provision has been made for their payment, and to inform the Senate, if no such provision has been made, what remedy should be pursued by the claimants.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have shown the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Applications are beginning to come to me by letter, as I suppose they are to other Senators, from persons having various old claims against Spain. A large part of the information required in the resolution was given by a report drawn by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the last session. This resolution merely inquires as to all the claims. I thought it the better course, under the circumstances, to address the inquiry to the committee rather than to the Department of State, as the committee will be less hampered by any difficulties with foreign countries in regard to the matter.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM NEBRASKA.

Mr. THURSTON. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of William V. Allen, appointed a Senator of the United States from the State of Nebraska by the governor of that State, and ask that they be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska presents the credentials of Hon. William V. Allen, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF NEBRASKA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER.

This is to certify that on the 13th day of December, 1899, William V. Allen was duly appointed by me a Senator from the State of Nebraska to represent said State in the Senate of the United States to fill vacancy caused by the death of the Hon. Monroe L. Hayward, said appointment to be in full force and effect until his successor is elected by the legislature of the State of Nebraska.

Done at Lincoln this 13th day of December, A. D. 1899.

[SEAL]

By the governor:

W. F. PORTER, Secretary of State.

W. A. POYNTER.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, there will be no objection to the swearing in of Senator Allen when he appears under that certificate; but the certificate is not correct in that it undertakes to define the term for which Senator Allen will hold—"until his successor is elected by the legislature of the State of Nebraska." The appointment should be only until the next meeting of the legislature of Nebraska. It is not, perhaps, a matter of much moment; but as the Senator is likely to appear at any time to be sworn in, and I have no objection to his being sworn in, that clause in the appointment must be regarded as void and of no effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be received and placed on file.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Alabama desires to take the floor, I will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the first bill upon the Calendar may be taken up and considered. If it occupies any time, I will not press it.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire not to press his request at this moment. I desire to submit some remarks on a joint resolution which I wish to have referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator object to having this bill taken up first? It is in order.

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is not in order till 2 o'clock. There are reasons—

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course the bill I desire to have passed is not so important as the speech the Senator from Alabama is about to make. So I shall not make any objection.

INJURIOUS TRADE COMBINATIONS.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Secretary to read Senate joint resolution No. 37.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 37) to prohibit combinations between corporations to control interstate commerce and transportation, introduced by Mr. MORGAN December 11, 1899, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That any contract, agreement, or combination between two or more corporations which has for its purpose the control of the price of anything which is the subject of or enters into interstate commerce, or the cost of the transportation thereof, so as to increase the same at any place or locality in the United States, or to discriminate in favor of or against any class of dealers, traders, or consumers of such articles within the United States, is contrary to the public policy of the United States, and every such contract, agreement, or combination is illegal and is prohibited.

SEC. 2. That any person being a member of any corporation, or acting as its agent, officer, or employee, who enters into any such contract, agreement, or combination, or knowingly assists in the execution or performance thereof, is guilty of a misdemeanor and is liable to prosecution for such offense on information or by indictment in the district court of the United States in and for the district in which such offense is committed; and on conviction thereof such person shall be fined in a sum not less than $100 and not to exceed $5,000, and also be imprisoned for a term, in the discretion of the court in which such conviction is had, not less than one month and not greater than two years.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the evils that are called "trusts" in our political parlance are all included in the effort to destroy or to prevent healthy competition in trade, whereby a monopoly is secured to some powerful person or combination of persons. What one man can fairly do, single handed or in partnership with others, in controlling trade is usually legitimate, whatever amount of money is used or whatever credit is employed in conducting the business. That is private business, not conducted under any separate or exclusive privilege granted by the Government, and the personal risk and labor required in its prosecution are a sufficient check upon those who embark in it to keep the business within reach of control through free competition.

This is not always true in commercial experience, but it seldom happens that capital concentrated in private hands is able to usurp or monopolize a particular line of trade so as to destroy competition. It has not often been the task of the legislator to deal with this phase of monopoly, if it can be properly so called; but for centuries it has been the onerous duty of lawmakers and judges to relieve trade and commerce against unjust and oppressive combinations.

Trades associations, guilds, and corporations have been the usual means of creating combinations of men for such purposes, and when it is found to be necessary for the general welfare to check or to suppress them the courts and the lawmakers have endeavored to prevent the agreements under which such combinations have been formed.

This is the object of the joint resolution under discussion, which is supported as to its purpose by the legislative and judicial history of the Anglo-Saxon race since it was organized for self-government.

It may be said with confidence that there exists in what we call the common law of England, imported into this country, a penal law for the repression of every trust and monopoly that affects injuriously the people of our States and our interstate commerce. But our Federal courts are not fully empowered with the broadest common-law jurisdiction, and statutes are needed to reach the evils that injuriously affect the scope and the freedom of our commercial dealings, which are exclusively subject to regulation by Congress. Any State could enact a law in the terms of this joint resolution to regulate trade among its own people, and Congress can do this to regulate interstate and foreign commerce.

I admit that this joint resolution, if it is enacted into a statute, can only operate to prevent the combinations it describes as between natural persons when they directly relate to or affect interstate commerce, and I insist that Congress has the right, and it is a high duty, to declare that any such combinations are illegal and may be declared criminal when they injuriously affect commercial intercourse between the States. As to corporations, the powers of government are more extended. Natural persons are under many disabilities as to their capacity to make valid agreements, and these may be added to by restrictions imposed by the statute laws for the common good. Contracts that are valid when made are carefully protected against legislative impairment, but the capacity to make contracts is largely subject to legislative control.

Sunday contracts and others that are contra bonos mores, such as the sale of lottery tickets, and contracts that violate the public policy, such as selling liquors to Indians, may be prohibited by statute and punished criminally, although they are made by persons who are otherwise competent to contract. They are contrary to the public policy.

Every State has the right to declare its public policy and to prohibit its violation by the subsequent making of such agreements, even by natural persons.

This joint resolution does not deal with natural persons except such as hold a responsible relation to corporations, as their officers, agents, employees, or owners.

A corporation differs in its rights and powers from a natural person by the breadth of the whole distance that divides a creature from its creator. The natural person, as a citizen of the United States, has all civil rights and powers that are not prohibited by law, while a corporation can have no existence aside from the express grant of the laws and no rights or powers that are not given to it by law.

Corporations also owe specific duties to the State or the public, which are expressed in their charters or are implied in the purposes for which they are created, such duties being the real consideration for which their franchises are granted. They must find authority in their charters or in the general laws for every act they perform and every agreement they make, and they must not cease to perform the duties to the public which are expressed or implied in the purposes for which they were created. Two fatal objections to the acts and agreements of corporations, which can not be waived or condoned, are that they are ultra vires, or that they are contrary to the public policy.

I believe it is true that in the vast number of corporations that exist or have existed in the United States not one of them has been given the authority, express or implied, to do what is prohibited in this joint resolution. It may be assumed with entire safety that any such agreement as is described in the resolution would be ultra vires as to all the contracting parties.

Neither the United States nor any State has ever attempted to place corporations on a footing with natural persons as to their capacity to enter into agreements or as to the scope of the agreements they might make. Corporations are strictly limited to the powers expressly conferred on them by law and those to be justly inferred from such express grants.

No decision can be found in our courts that sustains the doctrine that a corporation can lawfully act in excess of its actual powers conferred by law, even so far as to bind itself by estoppel. So strong and uniform are the rulings of all the courts on this point that this doctrine has become a settled public policy, and its violation may be denounced by statutes as a crime without creating any conflict with recognized rights or privileges.

When the act of a corporation is not only ultra vires, but violates a public policy established in morals or in law, there can be no doubt of the power of the Government to punish such an act or to prevent it. If an act when performed by a corporation is in violation of law or public policy, a conspiracy or agreement to do such an act may be prohibited by a penal statute; and if such an act is ultra vires, it may be declared by statute as being for that reason violative of public policy.

The capacity of corporations for evil when they exceed their charter powers or abuse their franchise to be a corporation is so great that such abuses may so grow into intolerable public wrongs that the State is compelled to repress or prevent; and when the evil becomes national, so that the State which grants the franchise can not repress it, it is the right of the United States, as a general proposition, to denounce and punish it. This may be done even where natural persons violate the public policy, as in the case of the issue of lottery tickets, and all who deal in or circulate them are made liable to punishment.

A like principle applies to the propagation of diseases, the adulteration of food, the circulation of treasonable or obscene literature, the poisoning of waters, the destruction of game and food fishes, the holding of intercourse with foreign governments to promote civil discord, and many other matters that are made evil because they are prohibited or because they are in their nature evil.

Every government exercises these powers for the protection of its own citizens and of the inhabitants of its country.

Corporations have no powers, certainly none that are expressly granted them, that are invaded by any authorized legislation for the protection or promotion of the general welfare.

In legislating for the control of corporations, if no such charter powers are injuriously affected, the field is clear; it is free from difficulty, and we may proceed with confidence.

In the vast and rapidly increasing number of corporations that threaten to absorb every important line of business of our country and to sink the individuality and personal enterprise and responsibility of men in the artificial character of officers and agents of these artificial persons, each corporation having a grant of special privileges and the means of indefinite perpetuity, there has grown up a danger to the people and the Government that is becoming so actual, so real, and so overpowering as to excite general alarm.

The courts are beginning to use their powers, aided and directed by imperfect statutes, toward the resistance of this vast and threatening movement.

In this great and patriotic task the Supreme Court of the United States has assumed advanced and firm ground, especially in the class of cases that involve interferences with interstate commerce, while in some of the States the courts are finding excuses for the violation of the general public policy in the supposed sanctity of the contract rights of the corporations or in the inability to connect the particular transaction with the purpose of creating monopolies or of placing unjust restrictions on trade and commerce.

In the case of United States vs. Britton (108 U. S., 199) it is held that there are no common-law offenses against the United States. A conspiracy or agreement, therefore, that violates the public policy of the United States in relation to interstate commerce is not punishable as an offense until it is defined and made penal by an act of Congress. The conspiracy must be evidenced by some act that is prohibited by the statute before it can be reached, as the laws regulating interstate commerce now stand. If the direct effect of the vicious agreement is to affect injuriously interstate commerce, it violates the Constitution and is void; but if it is made criminal by statute, it is punishable.

If Congress or the courts have the power to annul contracts that in terms are interferences with the freedom of interstate commerce, Congress has the power to denounce and punish as crimes contracts that have that purpose. And Congress can impute that purpose to any contract between two or more corporations that relates to dealings between them as to articles that enter into interstate commerce, if the intent is found to exist, and can punish them for entering into such an agreement. To declare that such agreements are criminal, whether they are express or are proven by a series of facts, and to punish the evil intent as a statutory crime, is a necessary power of Congress which can alone protect interstate commerce from such abuses.

The power of Congress to define and punish such offenses is affirmed in United States vs. Fox (95 U. S., 670).

The laws of the United States for the protection of interstate commerce afford ample civil remedies for that purpose, but they stop short of the necessary provisions to declare the public policy and to prohibit and punish the intent and the purpose to violate those laws.

To attempt to do a forbidden act does not imply its completion or any definite progress toward its completion. Any effort or endeavor to effect it meets the requirements of the law. (United States vs. Quincy, 6 Peters, 455; United States vs. Riddle, 5 Cranch, 110.)

The entering into a contract for such a purpose is an attempt, an effort to do what the statute denounces as being illegal, and is within the legislative power of the United States. For the purpose of showing the exclusive Federal jurisdiction over this subject and of properly ascertaining the power of corporations to make such agreements as are denounced in these resolutions as being illegal and the power of Congress over corporations, I will present some extracts from decisions of our Supreme Court, some of them being of recent date, and will read extracts from some other authorities.

These cases, which I will presently read, establish broadly the Federal authority to protect interstate commerce against State laws and against the alleged rights of persons and corporations to regulate or to affect it injuriously.

They emphasize the rules of law that are older than our Government, and maintain them in full vigor, which confine corporations strictly to the powers granted to them; which forbid any transgression by them of the public policy; which hold all their powers subordinate to legislative control with reference to public policy and the general welfare, and forbid any infraction by them of the laws of the land.

On these foundations we can safely rest such penal statutes as will save the country from a systematic usurpation of rights and powers by corporations such as no other country ever experienced.

I read from Cook on Corporations:

The State may compel all insurance companies to make detailed reports as to their condition. (Eagle Insurance Company vs. Ohio, 153 U. S., 440 [1904].) The legislature may prescribe the conditions upon which corporations or individuals may carry on the insurance business, provided it does not discriminate in favor of its own citizens. (State vs. Stone, 118 Mo., 338 [1893].) The legislature may enact stringent regulations of insurance business and prescribe a forfeiture of charter for noncompliance. (Chicago Life Insurance Company vs. Needles, 113 U. S., 574 [1885].) The legislature may make it a criminal offense for agents of insurance companies to pay rebates on insurance premiums. (People vs. Formosa, 131 N. Y., 478 [1892].)

The case of Chicago Life Insurance Company vs. Needles, cited in the note, decides that the right of a corporation to exist and the authority to conduct the principal business for which it was created "were granted, subject to the condition that the privileges and franchises conferred upon it should not be abused or so employed as to defeat the ends for which it was established and that, when so abused or misemployed, they might be withdrawn or reclaimed by the State in such way and by such modes of procedure as were consistent with law. Although no such condition is expressed in the company's charter, it is necessarily implied in every grant of corporate existence."

This case, in its further discussion by the court, covers the whole subject of the right to regulate and control corporations and thoroughly sustains the resolution now under discussion.

I will read some further extracts from that decision. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan:

Equally implied, in our judgment, is the condition that the corporation shall be subject to such reasonable regulations, in respect to the general conduct of its affairs, as the legislature may from time to time prescribe, which do not materially interfere with or obstruct the substantial enjoyment of the privileges the State has granted, and serve only to secure the ends for which the corporation was created. (Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S., 68, 70; Commonwealth vs. Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, 21 Pick., 542; Commercial Bank vs. Mississippi, 4 Sm. & Marsh, 497, 503.)

If this condition be not necessarily implied, then the creation of corporations, with rights and franchises which do not belong to individual citizens, may become dangerous to the public welfare through the ignorance or misconduct or fraud of those to whose management their affairs are intrusted. It would be extraordinary if the legislative department of a government, charged with the duty of enacting such laws as may promote the health, the morals, and the prosperity of the people might not, when unrestrained by constitutional limitations upon its authority, provide, by reasonable regulations, against the misuse of special corporate privileges which it has granted and which could not, except by its sanction, express or implied, have been exercised at all.

I read from a note to Cook on Corporations:

Congress has the power to reduce railroad rates charged by an interstate land-grant railroad for the transporting of soldiers. (Atlantic, etc., Railroad vs. United States, 76 Fed. Rep., 186 [1896].) A legislative reduction of railroad rates is constitutional, though thereby the road will pay but 1 1/2 per cent on its original cost and only 2 per cent on its bonded debt, there being no evidence as to the "water" in the bonds or of the cost of the road to the present owner. Rates may be regulated to correspond to gross earnings. (Dow vs. Beidelman, 125 U. S., 680 [1888].) Railroad rates may be reduced by statute and made to depend upon the length of the road. (Dow vs. Beidelman, 49 Ark., 325 [1887].)

In Railway Companies vs. Keokuk Bridge Company, 131 U. S., page 384, the court say:

The outlines of the doctrine of ultra vires and the reasons on which it rests have been clearly stated in previous judgments of this court.

The reasons why a corporation is not liable upon a contract ultra vires—that is to say, beyond the powers conferred upon it by the legislature, and varying from the objects of its creation as declared in the law of its organization—are: First, The interest of the public that the corporation shall not transcend the powers granted. Second, The interest of the stockholders that the capital shall not be subjected to the risk of enterprises not contemplated by the charter, and therefore not authorized by the stockholders in subscribing for the stock. Third, The obligation of everyone entering into a contract with a corporation to take notice of the legal limits of its powers.

These three reasons are clearly brought out in the unanimous judgment of this court delivered by Mr. Justice Campbell in the leading case of Pearce vs. Madison and Indianapolis Railroad (21 How., 441), in which it was held that a railroad corporation was not liable to be sued upon promissory notes which it had given in payment for a steamboat received and used by it and run in connection with its railroad.

So it has been repeatedly adjudged by this court that a lease made by one railroad corporation to another, either of which is not expressly authorized by law to enter into the lease, is ultra vires and void. (Thomas vs. Railroad Company, 101 U. S., 71; Pennsylvania Railroad vs. St. Louis, etc., Railroad, 118 U. S., 290, 630; Oregon Railway vs. Oregonian Railway, 130 U. S., 1.)

In McCormick vs. Market Bank, 163 U. S., pages 49 to 50, the court say:

When the corporation is created by a charter granted by the legislature, any person dealing with it is bound to take notice of the terms of the charter and of the general laws restricting or defining the powers of the corporation. (Pearce vs. Madison and Indianapolis Railroad, above cited; Zabriske vs. Cleveland, etc., Railroad, 23 How., 381, 398; Thomas vs. Railroad Company, 101 U. S., 71; Pennsylvania Railroad vs. St. Louis, etc., Railroad, 118 U. S., 290, 630.) In like manner when the corporation is formed under general laws, by the recording or filing in a public office of the required articles of association and certificate, any person dealing with the association is bound to take notice of the documents recorded or filed, upon which, as authorized and controlled by the general laws, depend the existence of the corporation, the extent of its corporate powers, and its capacity to act as a corporation. (Oregon Railway vs. Oregonian Railway, 130 U. S., 1, 25; Central Transportation Company vs. Pullman Car Company, above cited.)

It is settled by a long series of decisions of this court that a lease of a railroad by one railroad corporation to another which is beyond the corporate powers of either is unlawful and void, and can not be made good by ratification or estoppel so as to sustain an action upon the lease; that this is so not only when the lease is ultra vires of the lesser corporation and therefore open to the objection of disabling it from performing those duties to the public, its performance of which was the consideration upon which it received its charter from the State, but even if the lease is ultra vires of the lessee corporation only, and therefore not open to that particular objection. (Thomas vs. Railroad Company, Pennsylvania Railroad vs. St. Louis, etc., Railroad, Oregon Railway vs. Oregonian Railway, and Central Transportation Company vs. Pullman's Car Company, above cited; St. Louis, etc., Railroad vs. Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad, 145 U. S., 303, 404.)

In Addyston Pipe Company vs. The United States, United States Opinions, recently handed down, the court says:

It is undoubtedly true that among the reasons, if not the strongest reason, for placing the power in Congress to regulate interstate commerce was that which is stated in the extracts from the opinions of the court in the cases above cited.

The reasons which may have caused the framers of the Constitution to reposit the power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress do not, however, affect or limit the extent of the power itself.

In Gibbons vs. Ogden (supra) the power was declared to be complete in itself and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution.

Under this grant of power to Congress that body, in our judgment, may enact such legislation as shall declare void and prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect of such a contract will be, when carried out, to directly, and not as a mere incident to other and innocent purposes, regulate, to any substantial extent, interstate commerce. (And when we speak of interstate we also include in our meaning foreign commerce.) We do not assent to the correctness of the proposition that the constitutional guaranty of liberty to the individual to enter into private contracts limits the power of Congress and prevents it from legislating upon the subject of contracts of the class mentioned.

The power to regulate interstate commerce is, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts of the nature in question from the jurisdiction of that body. Nor is any such limitation contained in that other clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It has been held that the word liberty as used in the Constitution was not to be confined to the mere liberty of person, but included, among others, a right to enter into certain classes of contracts for the purpose of enabling the citizen to carry on his business. (Allgeyer vs. Louisiana, 165 U. S., 578; United States vs. Joint Traffic Association, 171 id., 505, 572.)

But it has never been, and in our opinion ought not to be, held that the word included the right of an individual to enter into private contracts upon all subjects, no matter what their nature and wholly irrespective (among other things) of the fact that they would, if performed, result in the regulation of interstate commerce and in the violation of an act of Congress upon that subject. The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional right to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is, to some extent, limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

We can not so enlarge the scope of the language of the Constitution regarding the liberty of the citizen as to hold that it includes or that it was intended to include a right to make a contract which, in fact, restrained and regulated interstate commerce, notwithstanding Congress, proceeding under the constitutional provision giving it the power to regulate that commerce, had prohibited such contracts.

As has frequently been said, interstate commerce consists of intercourse and traffic between the citizens or inhabitants of different States, and includes not only the transportation of persons and property and the navigation of public waters for that purpose, but also the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. (Gloucester Ferry Company vs. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S., 196-203; Kidd vs. Pearson, 128 id., 1, 20.)

If, therefore, an agreement or combination directly restrains not alone the manufacture, but the purchase, sale, or exchange of the manufactured commodity among the several States, it is brought within the provisions of the statute. The power to regulate such commerce—that is, the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed—is vested in Congress, and when Congress has enacted a statute such as the one in question any agreement or combination which directly operates not alone upon the manufacture but upon the sale, transportation, and delivery of an article of interstate commerce by preventing or restricting its sale, etc., thereby regulates interstate commerce to that extent and to the same extent intrenches upon the power of the National Legislature and violates the statute. We think it plain that this contract or combination effects that result.

We have no doubt that where the direct and immediate effect of a contract or combination among particular dealers in a commodity is to destroy competition between them and others, so that the parties to the contract or combination may obtain increased prices for themselves, such contract or combination amounts to a restraint of trade in the commodity, even though contracts to buy such commodity at the enhanced price are continually being made. Total suppression of the trade in the commodity is not necessary in order to render the combination one in restraint of trade. It is the effect of the combination in limiting and restricting the right of each of the members to transact business in the ordinary way as well as its effect upon the volume or extent of the dealing in the commodity that is regarded. All the facts and circumstances are, however, to be considered in order to determine the fundamental question, whether the necessary effect of the combination is to restrain interstate commerce.

The joint resolution which I have the honor to present may not cover the entire evil, which is becoming so great and so alarming to the country. The words in which I have drawn the proposed statute may not be such as are most apt to repress this great national wrong. Whatever law we shall enact for this purpose will doubtless be improved hereafter by further legislation. The evil I am attempting to repress is already so great that it threatens to overmaster the governments, State and Federal.

Its chief promoters are corporations chartered by the States. If the corporations are stopped, or even checked in this dangerous work, I believe that the courts will take courage and put an end to it.

The combinations of corporations, already formed and now forming with tremendous activity, have for their purpose the monopolistic control of the food and raiment of the people, and all of the staple commodities, such as sugar, salt, grain, fruits, iron, steel, copper, tin, petroleum, lumber, and many leading lines of manufactures, and of the railroads that transport them. It can not be a distant period when the progress of these combinations will unite most of the great corporations in their respective classes into central bodies of control that will be able to dictate measures for their benefit to State legislatures and to Congress.

Under the pretense of economic administration they pile up great incomes for their officers and price the labor of their employees to suit their convenience; having no rivals to create competition in the labor market, their boasted service of the public through a reduction of prices is all at the expense of the just reward of labor and of the personal independence of the men whose skill and fidelity to their trust earns them their more than princely incomes.

I desire to know whether this Congress will respond to the almost despairing demand of the people for relief against the unlawful tyranny of the corporations?

Now, Mr. President, I wish to exhibit to the Senate and the country some object lessons of very recent occurrence and of somewhat concealed history which show the necessity for denouncing contracts of corporations as crimes when they are made for the purpose of controlling interstate commerce.

The Addyston Pipe and Steel Company and all the other corporations that were parties to the contract that the Supreme Court has denounced, rebuked, and annulled in the case of that company against the United States have formed a new company, under a New Jersey charter, under a new name.

They are of the class of wise men who, "foreseeing the evil, hide themselves." They saw that the Supreme Court would decide their contract illegal, and, being determined to work out their plan in disguise, the same men who owned and controlled the corporations in Tennessee and Alabama organized the New Jersey corporation. This is the fact, though it may not appear on the face of the papers.

Then, to consummate their illegal purpose, the New Jersey company has bought out all the property of the Alabama and Tennessee companies, real and personal, or has taken over all their property under long leases, and will conduct the same business at the same places and under the same arrangement and divide the profits—the spoils is the true word—on the same basis of distribution as is provided in the contract that the Supreme Court was then about to declare and has since declared to be illegal.

It is the same old jackass with the lion's skin thrown over him.

It is a crafty attempt at the evasion of the law, by uniting all the parties in interest, under the supposed shelter of a New Jersey corporation, who, under the guise, can transact the same business that the Supreme Court has declared illegal, through resolutions of a board of directors, without the necessity of entering into a contract with any persons outside the new corporation. All these corporations in Alabama and Tennessee, thus swallowed up and now sleeping in the belly of the New Jersey corporation, hold a relation to the public, to the State, and to interstate and foreign commerce which forbids them to surrender their property and their business to the New Jersey corporation, and their contract of sale, or lease of their property of every kind, of their business, and the control and management of their furnaces and manufacturing facilities is void, as being ultra vires and against public policy.

If this joint resolution had been enacted when this new deal was made, these men would have been amenable to criminal prosecution, and they would not have ventured on this artful and presumptuous defiance of the law of the land.

These are not such private corporations as can sell out their property and charter privileges to other persons. The public, the State, has claims on them of a high order for the full execution of their powers and duties.

They, with others, are the pioneer developers of the iron and coal mines that these States rely upon for the support of a vast interstate and foreign commerce. No more vital question ever touched the interests of a State and no subject over which the constant supervision and control by the State is more needed for public reasons and for the protection of mines and miners.

Neither Tennessee nor Alabama ever intended that their mines of coal and iron should be opened and worked by corporations of New Jersey.

If that is ever done, it will only be done with the consent of the legislatures of those States, not otherwise. They have not consented, and they will never consent, to such foreign control of their most vital interests.

Before I read the decision of the Supreme Court touching this point, in the case of the Central Transportation Company vs. Pullman Car Company, I will point out another recent combination in Alabama of the same kind to show the rapid and dangerous growth of this usurpation of powers by corporations and the necessity for its repression. A number of corporations in Alabama, chartered for the purposes of opening mines and working furnaces, in which coal and iron are the products, have created a New Jersey corporation to take over all their properties and to conduct their business with a capital of $20,000,000.

They have sold their property of every kind to the New Jersey company, which is only the counterfeit presentment of all their rights, powers, properties, and holdings, without any duties or responsibilities to the State of Alabama. This sale covers a vast area of land and many mines, furnaces, and short lines of railway. It is a monster monopoly, that had to leave Alabama to find a home and shelter in New Jersey, and a large corporation in which the governor of Alabama has, or had, a large amount of stock, leads the procession.

Now I read from the case of the Central Transportation Company against the Pullman Car Company (139 U. S., beginning at page 48) certain extracts that apply particularly to the remarks I have just uttered:

The clear result of these decisions may be summed up thus: The charter of a corporation, read in the light of any general laws which are applicable, is the measure of its powers, and the enumeration of those powers implies the exclusion of all others not fairly incidental. All contracts made by a corporation beyond the scope of those powers are unlawful and void, and no action can be maintained upon them in the courts, and this upon three distinct grounds—the obligation of everyone contracting with a corporation, to take notice of the legal limits of its powers; the interest of the stockholders, not to be subjected to risks which they have never undertaken; and, above all, the interest of the public, that the corporation shall not transcend the powers conferred upon it by law.

A corporation can not, without the assent of the legislature, transfer its franchise to another corporation and abrogate the performance of all their duties to the public imposed upon it by its charter as the consideration for the grant of its franchise. Neither the grant of a franchise to transport passengers nor a general authority to sell and dispose of property empowers the grantee, while it continues to exist as a corporation, to sell or to lease its entire property and franchise to another corporation. These principles apply equally to companies incorporated by special charter from the legislature and to those formed by articles of association under general laws.

By a familiar rule every public grant of property or of privileges or franchise, if ambiguous, is to be construed against the grantee and in favor of the public, because an intention on the part of the Government to grant to private persons or to a particular corporation property or rights in which the whole public is interested can not be presumed, unless unequivocally expressed or necessarily to be implied in the terms of the grant; and because the grant is supposed to be made at the solicitation of the grantee, and to be drawn up by him or by his agents, and therefore the words used are to be treated as those of the grantee; and this rule of construction is a wholesome safeguard of the interest of the public against any attempt of the grantee, by the insertion of ambiguous language, to take what could not be obtained in clear and express terms. (Charles River Bridge vs. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 420, 544-548; Dubuque and Pacific Railroad vs. Litchfield, 23 How., 68, 88, 89; Blidell vs. Grandjean, 111 U. S., 412, 437, 438.)

This rule applies with peculiar force to articles of association which are framed under general laws, and which are a substitute for a legislative charter, and assume and define the powers of the corporation by the mere act of the associates, without any supervision of the legislature or of any public authority. (Oregon Railway vs. Oregonian Railway, 130 U. S., 26, 27.)

The validity of the plaintiff's incorporation, as well as its power to make that indenture, however, depends not solely upon the original charter and the general laws under which it came into existence, but mainly upon a special act of the legislature of Pennsylvania of February 9, 1870. By this act the validity of the charter for the object therein named was clearly recognized; the charter was extended for ninety-nine years, nearly fivefold the period for which the corporation was or could have been formed under general laws; and the corporation was expressly empowered to double its capital stock and "to enter into contracts with corporations of this or any other State for the leasing or hiring and transfer to them, or any of them," of its "railway cars and other personal property."

The plaintiff, therefore, was not an ordinary manufacturing corporation, such as might, like a partnership or an individual engaged in manufactures, sell or lease all its property to another corporation. (Ardesco Oil Company vs. North American Oil Company, 66 Penn. St., 373; Treadwell vs. Salisbury Manufacturing Company, 7 Gray, 333.) But the purpose of its incorporation, as defined in its charter and recognized and confirmed by the legislature, being the transportation of passengers, the plaintiff exercised a public employment and was charged with the duty of accommodating the public in the line of that employment, exactly corresponding to the duty which a railroad corporation or a steamboat company as a carrier of passengers owes to the public, independently of possessing any right of eminent domain.

The public nature of that duty was not affected by the fact that it was to be performed by means of cars constructed and of patent rights owned by the corporation and over roads owned by others. The plaintiff was not a strictly private, but a quasi public corporation; and it must be so treated as regards the validity of any attempt on its part to absolve itself from the performance of those duties to the public, the performance of which by the corporation itself was the remuneration that it was required by law to make to the public in return for the grant of its franchise. (Pickard vs. Pullman Southern Car Company, 117 U. S. 34; York and Maryland Railroad vs. Winans, 17 How., 30, 39; Railroad Company vs. Lockwood, 17 Wall., 357; Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company vs. Phoenix Insurance Company, 129 U. S., 397.)

The provision of this statute, by which the plaintiff is empowered to contract with other corporations "for the leasing or hiring and transfer to them, or any of them, of its 'railway cars and other personal property,'" is fully satisfied by construing it as confirming the plaintiff's right to do as it had been doing, to "lease" or "hire" (which are equivalent words) to other corporations in the regular course of its business, and to "transfer" under such leasing or hiring its "railway cars" and "other personal property" either connected with the cars or at least of the same general nature of tangible property.

It can hardly be stretched to warrant the plaintiff in making to a single corporation an absolute transfer or a long lease of all that might be comprehended in the words "personal property" in their widest sense, including not only goods and chattels, but moneys, credits, and rights of action. In any view it would be inconsistent alike with the main purpose of the statute and with the uniform course of decision in this court to construe these words as authorizing the plaintiff to deprive itself, either absolutely or for a long period of time, of the right to exercise the franchise granted to it by the legislature for the accommodation of the public.

Considering the long term of the indenture, the perishable nature of the property transferred, the large sums to be paid quarterly by the defendant by way of compensation, its assumption of the plaintiff's debts, and the frank avowal, in the indenture itself, of the intention of the two corporations to prevent competition and to create a monopoly, there can be no doubt that the chief consideration for the sums to be paid by the defendant was the plaintiff's covenant not to engage in the business of manufacturing, using, or hiring sleeping cars; and that the real purpose of the transaction was, under the guise of a lease of personal property, to transfer to the defendant nearly the whole corporate franchise of the plaintiff and to continue the plaintiff's existence for the single purpose of receiving compensation for not performing its duties.

The necessary conclusion from these premises is that the contract sued on was unlawful and void, because it was beyond the powers conferred upon the plaintiff by the legislature and because it involved an abandonment by the plaintiff of its duty to the public.

There is strong ground also for holding that the contract between the parties is void, because in unreasonable restraint of trade, and therefore contrary to public policy. Of the cases cited by the plaintiff upon this point, those which have most resemblance to the present case are quite distinguishable.

I hope, Mr. President, the committee that will have the joint resolution in charge, which, I think, ought to be the Committee on the Judiciary, will examine carefully the whole of that great opinion, one of the most carefully studied cases in the reports, involving a vast amount of property and involving turpitude on the part of the Pullman Car Company that is almost unequalled in the transactions of any organization, where they bought and received a vast amount of personal property, four or five patents for sleeping cars, obligations, contracts, dues to the transportation company at the time of the transaction, leasing the whole of it for ninety-nine years and agreeing to pay a very large stipend annually, $234,000, for the lease.

When they came to demand the last two of these stipends for the leasing of the property under their contract, the Pullman Car Company coolly announced that it was not bound by the contract; that it was ultra vires. "But," said the transportation company, "you have got our money; you have got our patent rights; you have been for twelve or fourteen years running under these patents, manufacturing cars; you have made an enormous amount of money; you paid us up to within the last one or two installments; and now you propose to take all that you have received from us upon the plea that you violated your charter in making that contract and hold to the money and the property?" "Yes," and they quietly informed them that that was their purpose; and the Supreme Court was compelled to sustain them.

That leading and strong case, Mr. President, shows that where a contract is made between two corporations, as to either of which it is ultra vires, or when a contract is made contrary to public policy by these artificial and fictitious beings, the powers of legislation, whether State or Federal, according to the nature of the subject which they affect, are complete and full not only to set aside the contracts, but they are complete and full also to treat the agreement made between these parties as an effort, an endeavor, a movement to carry into effect this illegal purpose, and that is the whole scope of the simple joint resolution I have offered.

If that, or something equivalent to it, is adopted by the Congress of the United States, it will break the back of every trust in this Union, and it will save to this people millions upon millions, untold millions, of money that is now and will hereafter be wrung out of them, and it will save to this country the most profound disgrace that was ever visited upon a civilized country in the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator from Alabama desire to have made of the joint resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I desire that it shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will, without objection, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROMOTIONS IN NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I now ask that the first bill on the Calendar may be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the Calendar.

The bill (S. 330) to restore to their original status as to promotion officers of the Navy and Marine Corps losing numbers by reason of the advancement of other officers for exceptional and meritorious service during the war with Spain was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that the advancement in rank of officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, whensoever made, for service rendered during the war with Spain, pursuant, respectively, to the provisions of sections 1506 and 1605 of the Revised Statutes, shall not interfere with the regular promotion of officers otherwise entitled to promotion, but that officers so advanced to higher grades by reason of war service shall be carried thereafter as additional to the numbers of each grade to which they may at any time be promoted; that each such officer shall hereafter be promoted in due course, contemporaneously with and to take rank next after the officer immediately above him; and that all advancements made by reason of war service shall be appropriately so designated upon the official Navy lists; but no promotion shall be made to fill a vacancy occasioned by the promotion, retirement, death, resignation, or dismissal of any officer who, at the time of such promotion, retirement, death, resignation, or dismissal, is an additional member of his grade under the provisions of this act.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear an explanation of the necessity for the passage of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I explained this bill before it passed the Senate last summer, on the request of the Senator from Missouri. In brief, it simply provides that when advancements of officers have been made in pursuance of the existing law so that they get promotions, those advancements shall not delay the promotions at the appropriate time of other officers of the Navy. It is a bill which the Senator from Missouri well understood when it passed the Senate before. It is a bill to which I know of no just objection, and, indeed, I know of no one who does object to it in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the bill in the same form as the bill that was passed at the last session?

Mr. CHANDLER. In the same form exactly, the same language as it was when it was passed at the time the Senator from Missouri called my attention to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

STATUE OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the appointment of a committee on the part of the Senate and House of Representatives to make arrangements for the reception and unveiling, on January 18, 1900, of the statue of Daniel Webster, which was in line 3, after the word "and," and to strike out "three" and insert "five."

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee on the part of the Senate be selected?

Mr. CHANDLER. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BACON as the committee on the part of the Senate.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM L. GREENE.

Mr. THURSTON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives announcing the death of Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Nebraska, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives referred to by him, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, late a Representative from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska submits resolutions, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, late a Representative from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 19, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

POSTMASTER.

Minot Wales Baker, to be postmaster at Randolph, in the county of Norfolk and State of Massachusetts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 18, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

Mr. BARTLETT appeared and took the oath of office.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Monday, December 11, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. No. 1, entitled "A bill to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes;" general debate thereon shall continue to not later than 5 o'clock p. m. of Friday, the 15th day of December, and thereafter debate under the five-minute rule until 5 o'clock p. m. of Saturday, the 16th day of December, at which time the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, with any amendments adopted by the committee, and a vote shall be taken on the bill and amendments, if any, without intervening motion, to final passage, immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday, the 18th day of December. And during said debate the House shall on each day adjourn not later than 5 o'clock p. m.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES. Is it not now in order to move to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. GAINES. For the purpose of reporting a bill for the free coinage of silver at the present legal ratio?

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was accordingly engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas, 190, nays 150, not voting 14; as follows:

Bishop,	Davey,	Robertson, La.	Wheeler, Ala.
Broussard,	Gillet, N. Y.	Smith, Md.
Campbell,	Harmer,	Stallings,

So the bill was passed.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. HARMER with Mr. BROUSSARD.

Mr. BISHOP with Mr. CAMPBELL.
For this day:

Mr. VREELAND with Mr. DAVEY.

Mr. JOY with Mr. CATCHINGS.

Mr. GILLET of New York with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Montana, Mr. CAMPBELL. I therefore withdraw my vote. If he were present he would vote "nay," and I would vote "yea."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say on behalf of my colleague, Mr. JOY, that he is detained by serious illness in his family. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. BELLAMY, is necessarily detained from the House this morning. If present, he would vote "nay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask indefinite leave to print some remarks upon the financial bill which has just passed, and with it an appendix of some speeches heretofore made by me and an analysis of various votes upon coinage and currency legislation.

The SPEAKER. For what length of time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. McRAE. I would like to have the time unlimited, because of my ill health.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to print remarks on the bill just passed and to have unlimited time to do so, he having been confined to the hospital during the consideration of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the House to grant me the privilege of printing, without any limit now, on account of the fact that I was not present during the debate.

The SPEAKER. A similar request to that last granted is made by the gentleman from Georgia. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request. I was absent on account of a death in my family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, absent on account of a death in his family, submits a similar request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, my attention was diverted for a moment and I did not hear all of the names just read. Does that last assignment include the name of the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Wheeler?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE-ELECT RICHARD P. BLAND.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the delegation of which I am a member, I announce to the House the death of the Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, long a Representative in Congress from the State of Missouri and elected a member of this House. His death occurred at his home, near Lebanon, Mo., on the 15th of last June. At a later date we shall ask that a time be set apart for paying suitable tribute to his high character and memory. At present I ask the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, long a Representative in Congress from the State of Missouri and a member-elect of this body.

Resolved further, That these resolutions be communicated to the Senate, and that, as a special mark of our high regard for the deceased and out of reverence for his memory, the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and accordingly the House (at 1 o'clock and 4 minutes) adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1899.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN F. HURST, D. D., bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. McMILLAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

SENATOR FROM NEBRASKA.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, Hon. William V. Allen, a Senator by appointment from the State of Nebraska, is present, and I ask that the oath of office be now administered to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will present himself and take the required oath of office.

Mr. Allen was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. THURSTON, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, late a Representative from the State of Missouri, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill which has just come from the House of Representatives may be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KYLE presented the petitions of M. J. McLaughlin and 40 other citizens of Sioux Falls, of Frank Mitchell and 16 other citizens of Faulkton, of M. J. Dewey and 67 other citizens of Hot Springs, and of the congregations of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, the Congregational Church, and the First Baptist Church, and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Pierre, all in the State of South Dakota, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DEBOE presented the petitions of J. P. Mitchell and sundry other citizens of Harrodsburg, S. H. Jackson and sundry other citizens of Oakley, J. B. Myers and sundry other citizens of Milledgeville, and of Rev. Edward L. Warren and sundry other citizens, all in the State of Kentucky, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BERRY presented the petition of J. B. Ray and sundry other citizens of Marble, Huntsville, and Alabam, all in the State of Arkansas, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut presented the petition of Donald Miller and sundry other citizens of Lyme and Blackhall, and the petition of E. J. Wilcox and sundry other citizens of Hebron, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON presented the petitions of Charles Knapp and 10 other citizens of Alexandria, A. E. Anderson and 5 other citizens, J. W. Mooney and 17 other citizens of Minnetonka, William Gardner and 13 other citizens of Wells, E. T. Schallert and 17 other citizens of Brighton, L. Bergsten and 10 other citizens of Nelson, and of E. Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented a petition of sundry members of the bar of the supreme court of the Hawaiian Islands, praying for the enactment of legislation relative to the tenure of judicial officers in those islands; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the petition of J. K. Richards, Solicitor-General, John G. Carlisle, Frank W. Hackett, John B. Cotton, J. Hubley Ashton, and 50 other members of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States. The petitioners "invite attention to the urgent need of better quarters for the law library of Congress, now overflowing a basement room of the Capitol." They say that "it is the greatest law library in the world," but that "there is no proper ventilation or light, and no accommodation whatever for access to the books and work of counsel preparing a case for argument before the Supreme Court of the United States;" that "gentlemen from a distance have no convenience for consulting each other or carrying on conversation," and they suggest "that some of the space lately occupied by the Library of Congress be given over for the purposes of the law library."

Mr. President, I am uncertain as to what committee I ought to have the petition referred. We have a Committee on the Library, we have a Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, we have a Committee on Rules, and we have a Committee on the Judiciary. I leave it to the Chair to decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the petition should go to the Committee on Rules. It will be so referred.

Mr. CULLOM presented the petitions of Charles T. Mack and 158 other citizens of Sterling, J. De Haan and 13 other citizens of Summit, Rev. W. L. Pierce and 100 other citizens of Rock Falls, L. H. Holtkamp and 15 other citizens of Mound, F. P. Crouch and sundry other citizens of Oak Park, Charles E. Dunlevy and sundry other citizens of Dana, J. W. Tennyson and 24 other citizens of Piasa, Rev. C. Virder and 111 other citizens of Yorkville, and of C. M. Piper and 50 other citizens of Bridgeport, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of 17,844 members of the Society of Christian Endeavor throughout the United States, praying for the establishment of an international tribunal of arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Hon. Richard Olney and sundry other members of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, praying that better facilities be granted in the law library of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Passaic, N. J., praying for a full and free competition looking to the canceling of the monopoly of the Western Union Telegraph Cable Company in Cuba; which was referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

He also presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted at the Thirty-third National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, praying that an appropriation be made to enable the Gettysburg National Military Park Commission to continue its work; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petitions of Rev. T. M. Sinnanton and 30 other citizens of Califon, Rev. F. Chadwick and 18 other citizens of Ridgewood, M. Dicker and 19 other citizens of Jersey City, Charles Hamilton and 32 other citizens of South Branch, Louis Campbell and 19 other citizens of Metuchen, J. R. Hursh and 15 other citizens of Crawford, J. W. Atkinson and 25 other citizens of Jersey City, Lora E. Palmer and 13 other citizens of Newark, and of C. Vreeland and 37 other citizens of Echo Lake, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ESTATE OF GEORGE H. WELLS.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 764) fixing times when, regulating the manner in which, and declaring the character of the accounts between the United States and the several public-land States, relative to the net proceeds of the sales and other disposition of the public lands made and to be made therein by the United States, which shall hereafter be stated and certified to the Treasury Department for payment, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The substitute reported has the approval of a majority of the members of the Committee on Finance, and I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill on Thursday, January 4, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask if the bill reported by the Senator from Rhode Island will be printed with the substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be, under the rule.

Mr. VEST. What was done with the bill reported by the Senator from Rhode Island?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was placed on the Calendar and ordered printed, under the rule.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Rhode Island, I understood, was to state that it was only the majority report.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did so state.

Mr. VEST. I beg your pardon; I did not hear it.

A bill (S. 1907) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca Paulding Meade.

Mr. HANNA introduced a bill (S. 1908) granting a pension to James M. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1909) granting a pension to Cecelia A. Price; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCOMAS introduced a bill (S. 1910) for the purchase of the oil portrait of Maj. Gen. William Smallwood; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 1911) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of John Clemson and John C. Cookson;

A bill (S. 1912) for the relief of the heirs of John H. Waring;

A bill (S. 1913) for the relief of the Locust Point Company, of Baltimore, Md.; and

A bill (S. 1914) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Salome Main.

Mr. MCOMAS introduced a bill (S. 1915) granting a pension to Catherine Meade; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1916) for the extension of Fifth street NW. in Takoma Park, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1917) to provide for the erection of a monument for Joseph Anthony Mower; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1918) granting an increase of pension to John E. Higgins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 1919) granting a pension to Consolacion Victoria Kirkland; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1920) to establish the Fredericksburg and Adjacent National Battlefields Memorial Park in the State of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1921) granting the right to the United States and West Indies Direct Telegraph Company to lay and operate cables between the United States and the island of Cuba and such other islands that the United States has sovereignty over; which was read twice by its title.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1922) authorizing the West Indies Development Company to acquire, lease, sell, and convey rights, franchises, and concessions from the local government of Cuba and such other islands that the United States has sovereignty over; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What reference does the Senator desire?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know really to what committee the bills ought to go. I suppose they should go to the Committee on Relations with Cuba, but I am not positive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both bills relate to Cuban affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. One of them relates to a right in Cuba to be obtained from the Cubans, and the other provides for a cable between the United States and Cuba.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think they ought to go to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

Mr. STEWART introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 46) to grant a permit to the Commercial Cable Company of Cuba to lay and operate a submarine cable; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

WILLIAM C. DODGE.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On the 7th of December I introduced a bill (S. 1008) for the relief of William C. Dodge. I asked at the time to have it referred to the Committee on Patents, which had considered it for a number of years previously and reported favorably upon it, but by some mistake it was referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask that the reference be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the former action will be reconsidered and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Patents.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

On motion of Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the evidence taken before the Committee on Manufactures on the adulteration of food be printed for the use of the committee.

DIGEST OF DECISIONS AND PRECEDENTS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document 278, second session Fifty-third Congress, the same being a "Digest of decisions and precedents of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, relating to their powers and privileges respecting their members and officers, and to investigations, contempts, libels, contumacious witnesses, expulsions," etc., as revised and new matter added, together with decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

STATISTICS RELATING TO THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That there be compiled under the direction of the Committee on the Philippines, for the use of the Senate, the best statistics available in regard to the area, population, agricultural and mineral resources, export and import trade of the Philippine Islands, together with such other information on this subject as the committee may deem desirable.

MARBLE PEDESTAL FOR BUST OF SUMNER.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be directed to procure a suitable marble pedestal for the bust of Charles Sumner near the entrance to the Senators' gallery, and that the sum of $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated therefor from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to state in regard to the resolution that there are, I think, eight marble busts in this gallery, some of them of a very high order of merit, and among them is the bust of Mr. Sumner, which was procured by the order of the legislature of Massachusetts and presented to the late George William Curtis, who delivered his eulogy, and by Mr. Curtis's family presented to the Senate. I believe that bust had a handsome marble pedestal when it came, but by some accident or change a wooden pedestal has been substituted. All the other busts have pedestals of marble. I thought instead of undertaking to reclaim the right one the best way would be to order the purchase of another, which would be necessary if either course were taken.

LEASING OF INDIAN LANDS FOR GRAZING PURPOSES.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate all documents, correspondence, reports, and papers relating to the leasing of grazing lands in the Ponca, Otoe, and Missouri Indian reservations, in the Territory of Oklahoma, since the commencement of the year 1897.

PAYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the testimony of W. B. Sorsby before the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, February 3, 1899, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution for the reason that there is a very small sum involved, and this item was omitted from the resolution adopted at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is necessary to send the resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the Senate can waive that reference. It is not necessary to refer the resolution if the Senate agrees by unanimous consent to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I shall object to that course; but I will say to the Senator from Alabama that if he will let the resolution go to the committee we shall report it back immediately.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a matter of only a few dollars, and the payment was omitted accidentally.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it would be a bad precedent set to have such a resolution acted upon without a reference.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported the foregoing resolution without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is completed and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 718) to authorize the President of the United States to cause certain lands heretofore withdrawn from market for reservoir purposes to be restored to the public domain, subject to entry under the homestead law, with certain restrictions.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota explain the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Some years ago certain lands in the northern part of Minnesota, at the head waters of the Mississippi River, were withdrawn from market for the purpose of constructing reservoirs—to be flooded by the reservoirs. The reservoirs have been filled, and these are lands that are not required for reservoir purposes. It is the object of the bill to restore the lands to open entry. It relates only to lands in Minnesota.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. ALLISON rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the Calendar will be proceeded with now. The first bill on the Calendar is one of importance, and I should like to have it acted upon.

Mr. ALLISON. I rose to move an executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that if the first bill on the Calendar occasions debate I will not insist on its consideration this morning. I think it will pass without debate.

The bill (S. 1476) creating a commission to revise and codify the pension laws of the United States was announced as the first bill on the Calendar, and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to its consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have an amendment to offer to section 4, which I will send to the desk. Let a semicolon be inserted and the words that I have written be added.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 4 strike out the period and insert a semicolon, and add the following:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to provide suitable rooms for the commission in which to hold their meetings, and to detail such clerical assistants as in his judgment may be necessary and proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have not the bill before me, so I can not designate the line, but—

Mr. GALLINGER. I hand the Senator a copy of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I thank the Senator. In the fourth line of the first section I move to strike out "three" and insert "five." I think there ought to be more than three members. It might happen easily that the commission would be disabled with but three.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, having reported this bill from the committee, I feel sure that I represent the views of the committee in saying that I have no objection and that the committee will have no objection to the amendment, if the Senate thinks it is a wise thing to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, section 1, before the word "members," it is proposed to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "five;" so as to read:

That the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a nonpartisan commission of five members.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD P. BLAND.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives relative to the death of Hon. R. P. BLAND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions referred to by the Senator from Missouri, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 13, 1899.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, long a Representative in Congress from the State of Missouri and a member-elect of this body.

Resolved further, That these resolutions be communicated to the Senate, and that, as a special mark of our high regard for the deceased and out of reverence for his memory, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, at some proper time we shall ask the Senate to join in paying fitting tribute to the memory and worth of Mr. BLAND. For the present I ask consideration of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri submits resolutions, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. RICHARD PARKS BLAND, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 20, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 19, 1899.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Hamilton G. Ewart, of North Carolina, to be United States district judge for the western district of North Carolina, to which position he was nominated on January 27, 1898, vice Robert P. Dick, resigned; but Congress having adjourned without taking action thereon, he was temporarily appointed July 13, 1898, during a recess of the Senate. On December 13, 1898, he was again nominated to the above-named position, but Congress adjourned without confirming said nomination; and on April 13, 1899, he was again temporarily appointed during a recess of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE CASE OF BRIGHAM H. ROBERTS.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses incurred and to be incurred by the Special Committee on the Case of Brigham H. Roberts shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House such sums as said committee may deem necessary for said purpose, and said committee shall submit vouchers for the expenditure of all sums of money disbursed under its order in the execution of this resolution, which disbursements and vouchers shall be subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will pardon a word, I desire to say, for the information of the House, that the immediate purpose of the resolution is to provide for the expenses already incurred and arranged to be incurred by the committee. It is the hope and expectation at present of the committee that it will not need to make a journey to Utah, but in that hope it may be disappointed. If it should be necessary, it will ask for further instructions or direction of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TAYLER of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution to have the same committee that is investigating the Roberts case investigate the case of the two postmasters, John C. Graham and Orson Smith. I ask that the resolution be read and be disposed of at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. LENTZ. I would like to know who objected, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. I made the objection.

CLERKS FOR ELECTION COMMITTEES.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Election Committees Nos. 2 and 3 are each authorized to employ a clerk, at an annual compensation of $2,000 each, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, is it usual to give these committees an annual clerk?

Mr. WEAVER. It has been.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has this resolution been considered by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. WEAVER. It has not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 4152) to extend the time for examination of monthly accounts by bureaus and offices of the War Department.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 330) to restore to their original status as to promotion officers of the Navy and Marine Corps losing numbers by reason of the advancement of other officers for exceptional and meritorious service during the war with Spain.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate appointing a committee of each House to make arrangements for the reception and unveiling of the statue of Daniel Webster.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BACON as the members of the committee on the part of the Senate to make arrangements for the reception and unveiling of the statue of Daniel Webster.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 330. An act to restore to their original status as to promotion officers of the Navy and Marine Corps losing numbers by reason of the advancement of other officers for exceptional and meritorious service during the war with Spain—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the two resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and hereby is, authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents as may be necessary for the business of said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not raise any objection to the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a moment ago, which resolution was similar to this, but it occurs to me from listening to the reading of the resolutions that they are not in the usual form in which we have heretofore passed them.

Mr. HULL. This one is, I think.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object to giving the committees the right to print and bind matter on hearings, or on matters pending before them, but this, as I understood the resolution of the gentleman from New York, and also this resolution, gives them unlimited power to print on any matter in their discretion. I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. HULL. With the exception of the words "and bound," this is the same resolution that we have had heretofore, and the committee have not understood that the resolution gives them unlimited power, but only the power to print on matters which come before the committee in hearings and in the transaction of their business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the committee ought to have that power, and I think it ought to be limited to that.

Mr. HULL. That is all we have considered that we had under this authority during the chairmanship of my predecessor, Mr. Outhwaite, and since I have been chairman of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that the resolution for the Committee on Ways and Means was drawn by the clerk, and he informed me that it was in the usual form.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If it is in the usual form, I shall not object to it; but it occurred to me that it was not in the usual form.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not compare it myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object, but I should like to compare the resolutions with those which have been passed heretofore.

Mr. HULL. This is in the same form as former resolutions which have been offered by the Committee on Military Affairs, with the exception which I have stated to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HULL a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be authorized to have printed and bound whatever documents and papers may be necessary for the use of said committee in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE SESSION.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Committee on Elections No. 1 be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be authorized to appoint an additional clerk for said committee, whose salary shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this has been customary in the past?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to ask the gentleman if it has been usual and customary in the past to allow this additional clerk?

Mr. HEPBURN. It has, Mr. Speaker, for the last three Congresses. That committee has had this additional clerk, and I think if there is any committee for which it is necessary to have such additional clerk—and I know there are a number where it is necessary—this is one of the committees. No one clerk can perform all the labor which is there to be performed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether similar resolutions do not usually go to the Committee on Accounts for consideration?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think you are correct about that; but the report from that committee on the subject has invariably been unanimous. The probability is that there will be no meeting of that committee for a considerable time, and a report can not be made by it soon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman expect to have a meeting of his committee to transact any business before the holiday recess?

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman knows that the chairmen of many of the committees have no private clerk during the session of Congress, and I think that it is only right and fair that they should have some one to perform some portion of the duties that devolve upon them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will let the matter lie over. There are several requests of a similar kind before the Committee on Accounts, and I hope you will let this take its course with the rest of them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution and ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is, authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents as may be necessary in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by the said committee during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This is the customary resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I gather, this resolution—

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is the customary resolution, I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will kindly suspend a moment until the House is in order. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine contains the language which I suggested a moment ago was not included in the previous resolutions, if I could hear them. This resolution says:

To have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee.

I think that is accurate, Mr. Speaker, and I have no objection to this resolution. It is the usual resolution and ought to pass; but we ought not to give to the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on the Judiciary unlimited power to print on subjects not pending and not to be considered by those committees, and the gentlemen offering those resolutions stated that the resolutions were in the usual form. Now, as I suppose they made that statement under misapprehension, I take it they will not object, by unanimous consent, to have inserted in those former resolutions these words.

The House certainly was misled, and I was misled and would not consent to give these committees power to print and bind, indiscriminate power and unlimited power to print on matters not coming before those committees to be considered.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee does not make any objection to this resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not. I take pleasure in saying that this resolution ought to pass.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I thank the gentleman for his eulogy and ask that the resolution be passed.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the former resolutions—one from the Committee on Ways and Means, one from the Committee on Military Affairs, and another from the Committee on the Judiciary, and any other committee that may have escaped my notice—the language I have suggested where they differ from this one.

Mr. HULL. I did not notice where this differed from the other.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It differs in this, that the leave authorized is confined to "subjects considered or to be considered" by the committee.

Mr. HULL. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, for unanimous consent to be given that those words be inserted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the resolutions giving authority to certain committees to print be confined to matters pending before the committee—

Mr. RICHARDSON. To "matters considered or to be considered." Just use the exact language of the resolutions heretofore adopted for all time since I have been here.

The SPEAKER. The leave to print shall apply to matters "considered or to be considered" by those committees. Is there objection to the request that this amendment shall be adopted? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the change will be made in the resolutions.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be authorized to have printed and bound all documents considered or to be considered by said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object. The language the gentleman has sought to use indicates that those words have been added while these matters have been pending. If he will read the resolution he will see that it does not comply with the former resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the amendment heretofore agreed to will apply to this resolution also. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LACEY. I tried to get the exact language while the gentleman from Tennessee was suggesting it.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

NAVAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to sit during sessions of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FOSS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING OF PAPERS, DOCUMENTS, ETC.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor be authorized to have printed and bound whatever papers and documents in connection with subjects under consideration by the committee that may be necessary to the transaction of its business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if that privilege has been heretofore extended to this committee? I can understand why this privilege should be accorded to committees that have appropriation bills; that would seem to be necessary, but this committee has no jurisdiction over appropriation bills. I do not see the propriety of this, and I shall object, unless the privilege has been heretofore accorded that committee.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I can not speak from the record; but my understanding is that the privilege has been twice extended to this committee, with a limitation of $500. In the last Congress the privilege was not extended to the committee, because it was not asked for; but it was found before the close of the session that not asking for it was an error. There were papers that should and ought to have been printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will not the gentleman be satisfied with asking for it when it becomes necessary? Perhaps it will not be necessary at all. I do not want to stand in the way of what is necessary, but I do not see now that there can be any immediate call for it. It will add unnecessarily to the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I concur with the gentleman that it may not be necessary for every committee to have this authority. I wish to assure the gentleman from Tennessee, however, that this committee that now asks for it will not abuse its privilege. There are subjects under consideration at Detroit, subjects under consideration by the Industrial Commission, that will unquestionably make it necessary for the committee to have this privilege.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under that view, Mr. Speaker, I will not object.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON ROBERTS CASE.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Special Committee on the Case of Brigham H. Roberts be authorized to have printed and bound the proceedings and testimony taken by said committee and such documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered and to be considered by said committee.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what was the first part of that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the resolution again reported?

Mr. LENTZ. I do.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. LENTZ. I shall object, Mr. Speaker, unless the committee be also authorized to investigate John C. Graham and Orson Smith.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

UNVEILING STATUE OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

The SPEAKER. The Senate having agreed to an amendment of the resolution in respect to making preparations for unveiling the Webster statue, the Chair desires to announce the House members of that committee.

The Clerk will read the names.

The Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. W. C. LOVERING, Massachusetts; ROBERT G. COUSINS, Iowa; FRANK G. CLARKE, New Hampshire; AMOS J. CUMMINGS, New York, and JOHN WESLEY GAINES, Tennessee.

COMMITTEE ON THE ROBERTS CASE.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection. I am told by gentlemen of the committee that they need this authority.

The SPEAKER. The objection having been withdrawn to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair will ask if there is any further objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was then agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back House resolution 47 for distributing the President's message, with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House at the present time as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reports from the Committee on Ways and Means a resolution distributing the President's message to appropriate committees, and asks unanimous consent that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman what debate he proposes to have on the resolution?

Mr. PAYNE. I know of no debate on this side, except the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] desires to make some remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How much time will be occupied?

Mr. PAYNE. About thirty or forty minutes, the gentleman says.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suppose the gentleman will not object to our taking forty minutes on this side?

Mr. PAYNE. None in the least; no trouble about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. We have no objection to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session as relates to the revenue, the bonded debt of the United States, and the treaties affecting the revenue be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to the foreign affairs, the consular and diplomatic service, including appropriations therefor, together with the accompanying correspondence and documents, and to the revision of treaties other than treaties affecting the revenue, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

That so much as relates to the appropriations of the public revenue for support of the Government as herein provided, namely, for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for pensions; for the District of Columbia, and for all deficiencies, and also for the exposition at Paris in 1900, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States, to the administration of justice, and the organization of courts, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

That so much as relates to banks and banking and the currency be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

That so much as relates to the mints of the United States and to the coinage of gold and silver bullion be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

That so much as relates to the commerce of the United States, domestic and foreign, except so far as it affects the revenue, to intercolonial railways, and the Nicaragua Canal, be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

That so much as relates to agriculture and appropriations therefor be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

That so much as relates to the merchant marine and fisheries be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

That so much as relates to the military establishment and appropriations therefor be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

That so much as relates to the naval establishment and to the construction of additional vessels for the Navy, and appropriations therefor, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

That so much as relates to the post-offices and post roads and to the carrying of the foreign mails and appropriations therefor be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

That so much as relates to the public domain be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

That so much as relates to the relations of the United States to the Indian tribes and appropriations therefor be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

That so much as relates to the Territories, Alaska, and the Hawaiian Islands be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

That so much as relates to the islands which came to the United States through the treaty of 1899 with Spain, and to Cuba (except so much as relates to the revenue and the appropriations), be referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

That so much as relates to pensions be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

That so much as relates to the Pacific railroads be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

That so much as relates to the civil service be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

That so much as relates to quarantine regulations and foreign immigration be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

With the following committee amendment:

Insert at the end of the resolution the following:

"That so much as relates to the census be referred to the Select Committee on the Twelfth Census."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that this is the usual resolution for the distribution of the President's message. It conforms to the amendment which was made by the House in the last Congress as to the matter to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and that to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Two or three new clauses have been added, because new topics have been treated in the message. That relating to insular affairs and to Cuba is referred to the committee appointed under the rules upon that subject, in the language of the rule. The committee have also recommended an amendment so that what is said in reference to the census is to be referred to the Select Committee on the Twelfth Census. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from New York yields to the gentleman from Pennsylvania will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. As I understood the reading of that resolution, matters relating to quarantine are referred to the Committee on Immigration. Heretofore the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has uniformly had jurisdiction over that matter under the rules of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. This resolution is in the form in which a similar resolution was adopted in the last Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had jurisdiction of that matter during the last Congress, and always has had so far as my knowledge goes.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, suppose the gentleman allows the general debate to proceed, and we will look that matter up. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, what is the duty and present responsibility of this nation to liberty and humanity? On the 21st day of April, 1898, Congress authorized and directed the President to use the Army and Navy of the United States to compel Spain to withdraw her flag and abandon forever her sovereignty over the island of Cuba. Never was an act of Congress more universally approved by the people.

Within ten days after this direction to the President, a squadron of the American Navy, cruising in Asiatic waters, in obedience to orders received by its commander to strike the enemy wherever found and "to capture or destroy his ships," sailed into the harbor of Manila and destroyed the Pacific squadron of the Spanish navy in a victory unparalleled in the world's history of naval warfare. From that time to this the flag of the United States has floated supreme in the Bay of Manila, and within one hundred days from the declaration of war by Congress it floated in triumph over Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, from all of which the flag and sovereignty of Spain was forever expelled.

Thus, by the fortunes of war, approved in its beginning almost unanimously by the people, were Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands added to the territory of the United States. Such territory, whether desirable or not, was thenceforth to be either Spanish or American. This was the only alternative. The war, it is true, was begun on our part in behalf of liberty and humanity for a million and a half of people in the island of Cuba. Are liberty and humanity questions of latitude and longitude? Spanish rule for three hundred years in the Philippine Islands had been scarcely less cruel than in the island of Cuba. In the fortunes of war the first act against the enemy was the destruction of Spanish sovereignty over eight or ten millions of people in the far-off Philippines instead of the million and a half in Cuba.

Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands were acquired in the fortunes of war and by a treaty of peace with Spain, in the same way that California and other territory was acquired in the fortunes of war and by a treaty of peace with Mexico. Twenty millions of dollars was paid to Spain in concluding with her a treaty of peace. Fifteen millions was paid to Mexico in concluding with her a treaty of peace. The twenty millions paid to Spain was for her relinquishment of sovereignty over Cuba, Puerto Rico, and all her islands in the West Indies, and over the island of Guam and the Philippines, in the Pacific Ocean.

These $20,000,000 offered by the American commission in the form of an ultimatum at the close of negotiations, before a single article of the treaty had been finally concluded, were to cover all cessions of territory and all questions in controversy as to the debts and public property of Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippine Islands. The fifteen millions paid to Mexico was for the relinquishment of her sovereignty over the territory we acquired lying west of the Louisiana purchase. The payment in both these cases was, as defined by Vattel in his Law of Nations, the act of "an equitable conqueror."

This Government has never acquired any territory outside of the original thirteen colonies without the payment of a money consideration satisfactory to the parties in interest. There is no question of forcible annexation of territory before the American people now, nor has there been. But there is a question of forcible suppression of an insurrection against the authority and sovereignty of the United States.

The flag of our fathers floats to-day over Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands just as rightfully as over Alaska or any of the territory acquired from France or Mexico. Whether this acquisition of far-off territory is good or bad, it has fallen to us unsought and unexpected in the fortunes of war—a war that marks a new era in the history of the nations, begun in no spirit of conquest or desire for territorial expansion, but only in response to the piercing cries of a common humanity by a people doomed by their oppressors to extermination by starvation and the sword.

After American arms had triumphed on land and sea, the only alternative presented was whether the Stars and Stripes of the United States or the Castles and Lions of Spain should float over these islands. Where is there an American heart, or one anywhere else in Christian civilization, so craven as to have justified the great Republic in giving back these islands, with their eight or ten million people, to the cruel despotism of Spain? Such a disgraceful act on our part, under the circumstances, would have been an indelible stain through all time upon the character of the American people.

After boldly proclaiming to the world that we were fighting the battles of liberty and humanity on behalf of a people crushed by a cruel despotism, were we to sheath the sword as soon as we became apprehensive that the contest might in the end impose something of a burden not foreseen upon ourselves, and for that reason were we to remand the helpless oppressed whom we had rescued back to the care of the oppressor?

What shall be done with these islands and what shall be the government for their inhabitants is now a question to be settled by the Congress of the United States.

But our anti-imperialist statesmen claim that, instead of Congress, it rightfully belongs to Aguinaldo to say what kind of government shall be established for the eight or ten millions of inhabitants in the Philippine Islands. If Aguinaldo and his little band of Tagalos drove Spain from these islands and compelled her to sue for peace, then in that case he might, as conqueror, have the right to dictate the kind of government to take the place of the Spanish government overthrown.

Whatever power destroys organized government over a people becomes morally responsible to the civilization of the age to replace the government overthrown by one equally if not more efficient for the protection of life and property. Spain relinquished her sovereignty over the Philippine Islands to the United States of America, not to Aguinaldo. From the time that was done the United States became responsible in the forum of nations to see that an efficient government is established for these islands.

We are told by the defenders of Aguinaldo and his Tagalo insurgents, as an excuse for their acts, that one nation can not govern another nation. The inhabitants of the Philippine Islands never were a nation and never had a government of their own. The eight or ten millions of their inhabitants, scattered over some thousand or more islands, consist of different tribes speaking different languages and of all degrees of civilization. Is not Congress just as competent to legislate for these former subjects of Spain as for the inhabitants of Alaska, former subjects of Russia, or for the people in the Territories of the Union?

Under the Government of the United States, since the last amendments to the Constitution, the personal, civil, and religious rights of all its inhabitants, whether near or far off, are secured to them in the language of the Supreme Court, "by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrains all the agencies of Government, State, and nation."

In these paramount rights the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands would be protected by Congress just the same as are the inhabitants of the District of Columbia. Will even the anti-imperialists say that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia are living under a despotic government and would therefore be justified in taking up arms against the Government of the United States?

The defenders of Aguinaldo claim that he and his Tagalo insurgents are justified in warring upon the United States, which released them from Spanish despotism, just the same as they would be if they were fighting Spain, for it is only, as they say, a change of masters. Thus they malign the institutions of their own country and libel the character of the people's chosen representatives. There can be no valid legislation by Congress inconsistent with the principles of constitutional liberty. The history of Spanish rule over her colonies has always been a blood-stained record of cruelty and lawless violence. Would not the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands be under a free government when under the Government of the United States? A people everywhere are justified in warring against despotism. But in this age of Christian civilization they are not justified anywhere in warring against free government.

Never was there an American gun turned upon any of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands until its Tagalo insurgents began killing American soldiers, who in the fortunes of war came to their country not as conquerors, but as their deliverers from the cruelties of Spanish rule, while prosecuting a war for the delivery of a million and a half of Spanish subjects under the same rule in the island of Cuba.

The first great duty of the United States now is to suppress the Tagalo insurrection against its authority and to establish order in the Philippine Islands. And when that is done, to provide a government for the protection of the civil and religious rights of their inhabitants, the same as is now done for the inhabitants of the District of Columbia or the Territories of the Union.

There is no question of territorial expansion or forcible annexation to be settled. That was settled by American guns at Manila and San Juan Hill, ratified by a treaty of peace with Spain. Right or wrong, good or bad, American territory has already been expanded. Our flag, raised first by a triumph in arms and next, from our unavoidable position, by a treaty of peace, floats to-day over the Philippine Islands just as rightfully as over this Capitol.

Wherever on the earth's surface that flag shall once rightfully float it can never be removed, save by an act of Congress or by an order of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in time of war. Any attempt to remove it in any other way would be an act of treason against the sovereignty of the United States, the same as it was in 1861, when General Dix said:

If anyone attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot.

The terms that General Grant fixed for all persons engaged in such attempts was "unconditional surrender." Why should any different terms be made now for Malay or Mongolian insurgents than was made then for American citizens born on American soil.

History is constantly repeating itself. Then there were those who claimed that war was Lincoln's war; now there are those who declare this war is McKinley's war; then it was copperhead; now it is anti-imperialist. Then there were self-assumed superior patriots who saw great danger to the liberties of the country in the disbanding of the two armies, composed of over 2,000,000 of armed men. Now the same kind of patriots see great danger for the future of the Republic in the development of a spirit of militarism should the Regular Army exceed 25,000 men.

Can the liberties of the American people—now 75,000,000 and doubling in number every thirty years, scattered over a territorial area of almost 4,000,000 square miles, with 45 independent States, to be hereafter increased in number, each fully organized with executive, judicial, and legislative powers, and each with an organized militia of its own citizens—be in danger of overthrow now, or any other time in the hereafter, by fifty or sixty thousand or any other number of citizen soldiers in the Regular Army? When the American people shall forget the glorious traditions of a heroic ancestry and become themselves fit subjects for slaves, then, and not till then, will their liberties be in danger of overthrow from any spirit of militarism within or from foreign aggression without.

This nation is not running the race the old lost nations ran, that "died of unbelief in God and wrong to man." No nation ever yet died or ever will, no matter what the extent of its territory or how vast its population, if governed by just laws and its people are imbued with a spirit of humanity as broad as the race.

Before the declaration of war with Spain the wisdom of far-off territorial acquisitions might have been a proper subject for consideration by the people of the United States. But as to the acquisition of territory in Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, it is a question settled by the arbitrament of the sword in the fortunes of war and by a treaty of peace recognized as valid by all nations.

There always was and probably always will be a class of "has-beens" who delight in perverting the facts of history in order to put their own country in the wrong so they can have an excuse for opposing its Administration, and who are always uttering warnings of danger and weeping in pathetic sorrow over the degeneracy of the times in the closing years of their own existence. So, to-day, these prophets of evil from the hilltops of a happy and prosperous Republic are, Jeremiah-like, pouring out their lamentations over the extension of American free institutions. Legislative wisdom, statesmanship, and patriotism in the chosen representations of the American people will not die with this generation, and I trust will not in any other.

Over a century ago our fathers, by their heroic deeds, consecrated the Fourth of July, 1776, as the birthday of a new era in the cycles of civilization. Is there anybody that would now change, if he could, the final results as we have them of this great experiment of free constitutional government? The result has come to us only by each generation of the people boldly meeting in peace or war their responsibilities to liberty and humanity as they have been cast upon them in the providences of human events.

Let this generation, then, imitating those of the bygone, shrink not from a manly discharge of its duty and responsibilities to liberty and the rights of a common humanity, though they may have been cast upon it unexpected and unforeseen in the fortunes of a just war. Every acquisition of territory by the United States heretofore, though opposed at the time by some self-assumed superior patriots, has always received the hearty approval of the people.

From my first entry into public life I have never had any fears for the future of the Republic by reason of the expansion of its territory and the extension of its free institutions. Pending the repeal of the Missouri compromise in Congress in 1854, I then said relative to expansion:

Who believes that the territorial expansion of the Republic will not continue until it covers the whole continent? It is one of the incidents of our position, resulting from the habits of our people and the character of surrounding nationalities. While the pioneer spirit presses on into the wilderness, snatching new areas from the wild beast and bequeathing them a legacy to civilized man, it is in vain you attempt to stay his progress by meridian lines or legislative enactments.

The habits of his life and the promptings of his nature are stronger than the river or mountain barriers of nations. When he has covered the whole continent with the abodes of civilized life, seizing the standard of the Republic, he will bear it, with the spirit and genius of free institutions, across the mighty deep to regenerate old dynasties and breathe new life into decaying empires. This, no matter what may be the views of statesmen or the policy of legislation, is our mission, our manifest destiny. For energy, intelligence, and superior enterprise are destiny, and whoever attempts to stay it may be borne down by the tide, but he can not change the current.

These words, uttered in no spirit of prophecy, and which at the time were only a plain statement of the characteristics of the American people and the surrounding conditions of national existence are, to-day, by the fortunes of war, prophecy fulfilled. But what prophetic ken can pierce the veil of the now overhanging future? The Atlantic Ocean, rolling between two mighty hemispheres, is a German, French, and English sea. But the Pacific Ocean, with almost twice the area of waters washing the shores of nationalities containing two-thirds the population of the globe, is henceforth to be an American sea covered with American ships laden with the products of American industry. The commerce of half the world, realizing the dream of Columbus, will go westward to find the Indies.

England, facing eastward, carrying her Magna Charta of personal rights and all her great institutions of civil and religious liberty, and the United States of America, firstborn of these institutions, facing westward, carrying the same institutions, with the practical experience of over a hundred years in self-government, will some day meet in the far-off Orient, having belted the globe with institutions of civil and religious liberty and constitutional free government for all mankind.

The white man can never lay down his burden so long as oppression and national injustice and wrong exist among the children of men. Nations, like individuals, owe something to a common humanity, for they are the trustees of civilization. It is ordained in the retributions of that overruling Providence which controls in the affairs of men that nations can not shirk their responsibilities to liberty and humanity when cast upon them, in the course of human events, without bitter retributions soon or late in national disasters.

The ships will part the unknown sea,
The march of thought will reach the strand;
The onward wave of destiny
Will change the features of the land.

The evil must give place to good,
The false before the true must fade;
There is no stay in Nature's way.
Men can not choose or peace or war;
She sets the task, and none may ask
What her far-reaching councils are.

Not in the way the world would please
The needed changes may be wrought;
When and wherever fate decrees
The destined battles will be fought.

The towers of strength give way at length,
If they be not by right maintained,
And in their place a higher race
Shall build as it has been ordained.

The American defenders of the Tagalo insurgents have no excuse for themselves in any acts of the American colonists. Our fathers in 1776 took up arms against unjust legislation and the attempt by the ministry of George III to restrict the rights and privileges of Englishmen. The colonists had Governments of their own, which they were defending against encroachments by the British Parliament.

The Tagalos in attacking the American Army, which delivered them from Spanish despotism, had no government of their own to defend, for none had ever been established; and they were not resisting unjust laws, for no laws of any kind had been passed; nor had any act of any kind been done by the American people or its Army injurious or even unfriendly to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

President Lincoln on the 4th of March, 1861, from the eastern portico of this Capitol, in addressing his dissatisfied fellow-countrymen, said:

You can have no conflict without yourselves being the aggressors.

In like manner President McKinley, through his commanding general, notified the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands that they could have no conflict with the United States without they themselves being the aggressors.

General Otis, January 9, 1899, in a communication to Aguinaldo, said:

I am under strict orders of the President of the United States to avoid conflict in every way possible. There shall be no conflict of forces if I am able to avoid it.

In the evening of February 4, 1899, Aguinaldo and his Tagalos became the aggressors and opened fire along their whole entrenched line upon the American soldiers guarding Manila. The same night Agoncillo, friend and special agent of Aguinaldo, leaves Washington hastily by the midnight train for Canada, hours before anyone else in Washington knew of the attack of the Tagalos upon the American army. From that time to this the Tagalo insurrection has continued, in pursuance of the plans formed by Aguinaldo in August, 1898, before the capitulation of Manila, when he announced himself dictator and addressed a communication to the leading powers, asking their recognition of the independence of the Philippines, and in pursuance of his purpose to capture or drive the American army out of Manila.

The Tagalos, under Aguinaldo, took up arms to kill their benefactors, who had never done them an injury, but who had periled their lives to release them from the cruelties of Spanish rule. At the demand of such an enemy—an enemy that knows no gratitude and whose barbarism holds prisoners of war for a money ransom—shall the flag of our fathers be lowered—a flag that never yet was lowered, save at the grave of the hero who died in its defense?

There is no justification for the American defenders of the Tagalo insurgents in anything contained in the Declaration of American Independence. The revolt of the American colonies began in a protest against unjust laws. Even after the few overzealous patriots had thrown the shipload of imported tea into the waters of Massachusetts Bay, Washington, Franklin, Adams, and Hancock, and most of their copatriots, had no idea of establishing a government independent of that of Great Britain.

The Earl of Chatham, Burke, Barre, Wilkes, and other English statesmen in advocating the cause of the colonies were defending the constitutional rights of Englishmen. And none of them ever advocated the right of the colonies to set up for themselves an independent government.

At length, after the failure of petition and protest, fifty-six bold merchants, farmers, lawyers, and mechanics, representing the organized governments of thirteen colonies, on the 4th of July, 1776, declared that their allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain was at an end. In justification of their act in severing their allegiance to the mother country and in combating the dogma of the divine right of kingly rule they proclaimed certain self-evident truths, among which was that "The just powers of governments are derived from the consent of the governed."

Up to that time mankind had been regarded as composed of two classes—the one born to rule, the other to be ruled; the one possessing all rights in the State, the other possessing no rights save such as might be conferred by the ruling class. It was in combating this claim of the few and the old political dogma of the divine right of kingly rule that our fathers declared that governments derived their just powers from the consent of the governed. In theory, a self-evident truth; but in actual practice then and ever since governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, if the governed are fitted for self-government. Consent of the criminal classes or of the stupidly ignorant are not necessary for a just government, never has been, and never will be.

The self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence proclaimed by our fathers in opposing the political dogmas of their times were ideals to be finally reached in the onward progress of the race to a higher and more perfect civilization, as the polar star, fixed in the heavens, is a guide for the mariner in his course to a haven of safety over tempest-tossed seas.

These ideals were not intended or expected by those who declared them to be reduced to immediate practice, for they did not themselves incorporate them into the framework of the new Government which they established. One-seventh of the entire population under their new Government were chattel-born slaves, bought and sold at the auction block, and continued such for almost a century after the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. The consent of women, one-half of the population to be governed, was not sought then nor since in order to give just powers to their Government.

The Saviour of mankind, when on earth, bade his disciples, "Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect." If this injunction is to be the practical test of Christian character, then there are no Christians in the world. But a time was promised in the long-coming future when this test applied to the pilgrims on earth would not be mere theory.

The ideals of the Declaration of Independence practically apply, and were intended only thus to apply, to a people fitted for self-government. It is an absurdity to apply them in practice to a people unfitted by general intelligence or experience to carry on a free and stable government by which alone these rights can be secured to the individual.

Lafayette, years after he tendered his life with his sword to the cause of American independence, advised the crowning of Louis Philippe King of France instead of the establishment of a republic, for the reason, as he said, that the French people were not then fitted for self-government. It would be a gross calumny upon a great nation to say that the French people were not at that time as well-fitted for self-government as are the Tagalos now, or any other portion of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

The American colonies had a practical experience in self-government under their respective charters from the Crown of Great Britain in township, county, and State administration for more than a hundred years, and yet not one of them adopted in practice then, nor have they since, the self-evident truth which they put in the Declaration of Independence, that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Even Massachusetts, home of Edward Atkinson and other like kindred spirits, has no provision in her organic law for ascertaining the consent of even a majority of her adult population to the constitution under which they live, or their consent to the enactment of the laws which they must obey. The legal voters anywhere are not one-half of the adult population whose consent in theory is requisite for just government.

The defenders of the Tagalo insurgents, calling themselves anti-imperialists, insist that these ideals of our fathers, which have never yet been incorporated practically into any government, shall be made a part of the government to be established for the conglomerate of Malay and Mongolian population in the Philippine Islands, a population which have never had any experience in any kind of self-government and whose unfittedness for such government at the present time is everywhere admitted.

But the population of these islands, under the controlling influence of the United States, with its free institutions, and their own better conditions after peace and order shall have been established, will no doubt in a short time become fitted for self-government. When that time shall come and the United States of America shall establish for these islands, with their eight or ten millions of people, a free and independent government, to be administered by themselves, it will be the gift of the great Republic to civilization of a colossal statute of liberty enlightening the world, throwing its refulgent rays from the mountain peaks overlooking the Bay of Manila, across the Chinese Sea, and over the Empire of oldest time, where dwells one-fourth of the present population of the globe.

Such is the mission, the manifest destiny, of this nation now, in behalf of liberty and humanity, the same as it was threescore years ago, before the pioneer settler scaled the snow-crowned summits of the Sierras or the flag of our fathers fluttered along the shores of the Pacific.

Henceforth, over whatever portion of the earth's surface the flag of the great Republic shall float, it will be the emblem of liberty, justice, and humanity, beckoning the race on to a higher and better civilization.

Westward the course of empire takes its way;

Time's noblest offspring is the last.

[Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] thirty minutes.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the President, in his message at the beginning of this Congress, said, first:

The Fifty-sixth Congress convenes in its first regular session with the country in a condition of unusual prosperity.

Then on the second page of his message he says:

It is further true that year by year, with a larger area of land cultivated, the increasing volume of agricultural products, corn and wheat, calls for a larger volume of money.

He shows that the supply of money as compared with our business is too narrow. Then he proceeds to show a manner in which we may obtain money. He says, "Give the banks more power, put less expense upon them, and they will furnish you the necessary funds."

Now, I want to say, in the first place, that from the time of the redemption of the first bank note to the present moment the financial history of the world has proven that every time the money in which a credit currency is to be redeemed shrinks in volume or confidence is lost your bank currency shrinks in the same proportion. The last few days have pricked the bubble of your exorbitant braggadocio and with it the prosperity that was built largely upon wind and the inflation of political hypocrisy.

Now, let us see how this great prosperity was built up of which the President speaks. It is true that it did not exist when he came into office. It did not exist until he began to fill the ranks of the Army with the unemployed, until he began to fill the shipyards with the unemployed, or until the syndicates and trusts, many of whom had their headquarters established in and near the Administration, began to inflate all values in this country. They began to build such trusts as had never been seen before in this land. They began to double the prices of trust products. They ran up wire, nails and necessities of life to double the prices which obtained when the natural laws of trade were permitted to exist. Then what occurred? When the President delivered his message and said to Congress, "These trusts are an enemy to civilization, and those practicing them are criminals," from that moment the disturbance began in the trust centers. From morning to morning the newspapers of New York said, "The trust decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and the message of the President are responsible for the disturbance in industrial values."

In other words, these values were simply inflated wind values, gotten up through the organization of these gigantic trusts under the protection of this Administration, which permitted such a thing to be possible; and this prosperity of which we brag so much, and upon which the changes have been rung here so often that some of you really believe that you have had extraordinarily prosperous times—this has been pricked in the last four or five days. It is true you have had apparent extraordinary prosperity in certain circles, where prices were controlled by the trusts, but you have not had it elsewhere to any great extent.

Now, sir, I want to say, further, that if, instead of passing the financial bill, that is fathered by the banks, made by the banks, and for the banks alone, we had passed a free-coinage bill, or passed a bill to have the paper currency full legal tender and issued and controlled by the Government, every newspaper in the metropolitan East would have had flaring headlines this week and for the last week, stating that under the Democratic destruction policy the Congress of the United States has destroyed the value of property in the United States, and you would find the same taunt coming from every member on that side of the Chamber.

The difference is that the Democratic party is not in power, nor has it any power with the great press of this country. Yea, it is not in power among the rich in this country, because Bryan Democracy and great wealth do not thrive in the same climate. You may take it in your State, you may take it in mine, and when a man becomes very rich he leaves the Democratic party and goes into the Republican party. Take it in the State of Colorado, and the moment the great smelting trust was organized, and was putting forth for the purpose of controlling the smelting industry, there was at the head of it in Colorado a lifelong Democrat, one whom we had honored as one of the first Democratic governors of our State. When that great trust was organized, and shut down smelter after smelter and threatened to dismantle smelter after smelter, our legislature was in session.

The Democratic governor of Colorado sent a message to the legislature asking that the power of the smelter trust in Colorado be curtailed at once. Next morning that lifelong Democrat came out in a Republican newspaper with an interview saying:

I believe that the McKinley Administration ought to be maintained in Colorado and throughout the country, because it better protects property.

That is occurring in every part of the Union. It is so with your wealthy newspapers. You may take the great Democratic dailies. When they reach wealth, though under a Democratic name, they cry out for the Republican Administration and all of its principles.

Now, for fear you may think I am somewhat prejudiced, I want to introduce a little Republican evidence upon this charge. Senator THURSTON, of Nebraska, chairman of the national convention that nominated President McKinley, the right bower of the President, recently said, speaking to the Republican clubs in Baltimore:

Capital in every form, alarmed by the threatened disaster and danger of free and unlimited coinage of silver at the forced ratio of 16 to 1 by this nation alone, rushed to the support of the Republican party, and it so happened thereby that the financial jugglers and monopolies, great trusts and combines that have always been with and of the Democratic party were forced in the last campaign into the Republican party.

Now, sir, what is occurring? I have made the point once before during this session that the banks of this country have the people now by the throat.

Mr. LINNEY. Will my friend allow me just a moment?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINNEY. I received this morning an inquiry from a clear-minded Populist of my State:

I sometimes think: "Well, how can it be? Am I mistaken? Is the Republican party right on the money and all the other public questions, and we honest, horny-handed sons of the plow wrong?" Really it looks that way. Now, God grant that that prosperity which has come has come to stay. Whether brought about by your party or not, we needed help, we have it, and I am thankful.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

What do you think of that sentence? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BELL. I think that in the State of North Carolina they have some real Populists, but more Republican-Populists than they have real Populists.

Mr. LINNEY. Let me ask my friend if the Populists of the State of North Carolina do not constitute a majority of the Populists of the United States? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BELL. I notice that a great many of the Populists of the State of North Carolina formed a combination with the McKinley Republican party last fall, and that they worked hand in hand with you.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes; to not let you Democrats steal away our homes, we did. [Renewed laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BELL. Now I will proceed, with the gentleman's permission, since he has read his letter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what I wish to say is this: That it was understood by the American people for nearly a century that the Treasury Department must be kept with the people of the United States and not with the national banks; and I wish to say, further, that at the time of the appointment of Mr. McCulloch, soon after the war, it created quite a discussion in the United States whether a national banker interested in circulating bank currency in opposition to national currency should have control of the national currency; and even when Mr. Gage was appointed, the present Secretary, Republican papers in the great East mentioned that such appointments had been unusual, and they pointed to Mr. McCulloch as the precedent for it.

Now, sir, what have they done? During the present Administration they have voted some twenty-odd million dollars into the hands of the banks; that can be demonstrated beyond peradventure. Under this Administration, when they voted two hundred millions of interest-bearing bonds to the market at par, called the popular loan, they voted into the hands of the banks not less than eleven or twelve million dollars. They said they should have these bonds at par and they were worth in the market not less than 105 to 106. A few days ago they were standing at 109, which would give them about $19,500,000 as a gift. For the Cleveland bonds there was offered in this House (if made for gold coin) $16,000,000 more than we got in simple coin, and the same Administration says, "Oh, they bought them for the discount on the theory that they might not be paid in gold; but we will pay them in gold, though bought on silver basis." And so it has been from the beginning of this Administration.

Now, here is another unusual favor being extended to the banks. The Secretary of the Treasury said to the banks of the country today that from this time on he will put into their vaults about $30,000,000 that the Treasury can spare, and will give them a million dollars a day that is coming in from internal revenue. What for? That you may help the people. How are you going to help them? We are going to help them by charging this enormous rate of interest that went up yesterday to 125 per cent. Now, sir, the Treasury Department is going to give the banks the use of this money and they are advancing the interest payments on United States bonds before it is due. Why? So the banks can lend it to the people, and lend it at these high rates of interest. Now, who gets the benefit of that? The banks get all the profits and the interest on hundreds of millions now held by them, and get it for nothing, and the people get the money under this beneficent system by paying the banks an enormous rate for the use of their own money. Now, let us see whether the banks are not absolutely controlling this country. Let us see what they did yesterday. Let us see how this prosperity works that even a little prick in the bubble can scatter.

Russell Sage said yesterday—

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask if he is alluding to the stock market of yesterday?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. One paper says that the rate of interest went as high as 186 per cent.

Mr. BELL. I know; but I am reading what Russell Sage said:

This is the worst panic New York has suffered in twenty years.

The stock-market reports said there were neither money nor confidence in sight and that money was lending for 125 per cent, and that those who held out in the morning finally had to go. It is stated that in a few articles $100,000,000 was the shrinkage in value, and it was all because of the tight money market and because the banks pulled in their loans.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to fill the banks and make the panic profitable to them. They will have hundreds of millions of the free money of the people to lend to them at high rates. Do you wonder that the banks always make a large contribution to the Republican party? They should do so, as they are Republicans, and the party allows them to make back the contribution tenfold.

Now, where does the bank get the benefit? The banks themselves do not turn around and let the people have the money for nothing or for a low rate of interest, but it enables the bank to get enormous interest and to enrich itself at the expense of the American people. Now, sir, what has occurred under this grand permanent prosperity that has been so lauded upon this floor since we began this discussion? On the 15th of this month the failure of John P. Squire & Co., of Boston, for three millions. The Broadway National Bank, of Boston, failed on the same day. The Produce Exchange Trust Company, of New York, failed on the 18th, with $11,000,000 liabilities. Henry Allen & Co., bankers and brokers, failed in New York on the 18th, and yesterday, the day we passed this gold bill, will go down in history as one of the worst wreckages known in the stock market of New York.

Now, sir, what I want to illustrate from this is the theory of the minority. We have insisted from the beginning that you may have bank currency, you may have the gold standard, and in normal times it will be reasonably satisfactory; but the moment, under the gold standard or any limited standard, that a credit money issued upon that and controlled by any bank syndicate or bank association—the minute there is a little flurry and the legal-tender money is scarce, that moment your currency issued redeemable in legal-tender money begins to shrink with your real money, and it can not suffice for a panic; it can not answer the needs of trade when you are seeking to check up and settle.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Does he not consider that the enormous taxation of $60,000,000 a month which is now imposed on this country is a cause of this tight money?

Mr. BELL. No; that is a mere pretense of the banker to get more profit in the future than he has had in the past. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has been encouraged in the past; he has a great majority in this House behind him, and he now thinks he is entitled to the whole country. That is about the banker's idea of it.

Mr. LEVY. Do you think that the monthly tax of $60,000,000 a month, internal revenue and customs—do you think that has no effect?

Mr. BELL. Oh, it may have a little effect on you fellows in New York.

Mr. LEVY. Does not anything which has an effect in New York have an effect on the entire country?

Mr. BELL. Not necessarily.

Mr. LEVY. You will find that out.

Mr. BELL. Not necessarily. If a few of your bubbles burst it may aid legitimate business.

Mr. LEVY. The country hears from it a week afterwards.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman [Mr. LEVY] know that the boards of trade and the merchants of New York generally are losing their export trade, and it is going to southern ports, and that they are wondering why it is; and, in fact, have been holding quite a number of meetings in order to find out a cure for this loss of business? New York used to be the whole thing commercially and politically, but she is not any longer, and the masses South and West do not propose to be "held up" by her any longer in commerce or politics, if by honorable and patriotic resistance they can prevent it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the several gentlemen who are addressing him?

Mr. BELL. No, sir. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I started to say when I was interrupted, my theory from the beginning has been this, and I have never agreed altogether with our statements of this proposition before the country, that it is a question of national currency, issued and controlled by the Government on one side, and bank currency, issued and controlled by the banks, on the other side. It is my judgment that that has been the real issue from the beginning, and we believe that you should have a currency, issued and controlled by the Government, commensurate with your property to be exchanged, so that there would at all times be an equilibrium between your ordinary transactions and the means with which to transact your business. That idea has been developed in England. It was partially developed in this country.

Mr. Calhoun very forcibly suggested to this House that we ought to have some means to determine how much money we should have, and he suggested that in his judgment probably we should have $1 in money to every $30 worth of property to be exchanged, and that then if you would keep up your equilibrium between property and money you could not have these panics. In England before the days of Rothschild every solvent note presented at the bank counter for a legitimate enterprise had to be discounted at a small rate of interest. If it was not so discounted, then the Government of England said it was a sign of a money famine and new notes must be issued. But after Mr. Rothschild became prominent he persuaded Sir Robert Peel, jr., then in charge of the finances of England, that the interest of the banker and the interest of the public was mutual; that the bank was always anxious to lend money, and that when it saw a scarcity it would issue money, because its interest was identical with that of the consumer of money; but the elder Robert Peel, who made the fortune of the family, when his son yielded to this view said to him, "My son, upon yesterday you doubled your fortune, but by doubling your fortune, my boy, you ruined your country."

Mr. HILL. I have just come into the Hall and have only caught two or three sentences of the gentleman's remarks. I understood the gentleman to say that the wise thing to do would be to have property and money graduated and kept at the ratio of $1 in money to every $30 of property.

Mr. BELL. No; I said that idea was developed by Calhoun early in the history of this Government.

Mr. HILL. As I understood it, that was a suggestion that you favored.

Mr. BELL. No, sir; I favored keeping the money commensurate with the business to be transacted, and to have the money issued, governed, and controlled by the United States instead of by the bankers of the country.

Mr. HILL. That is as I understood. Now if it will not interfere with the gentleman's remarks—

Mr. BELL. Not at all.

Mr. HILL. Will you kindly explain to the House by what process the Government is to do that—that is, keep the money commensurate—and how it is going to get it into circulation?

Mr. BELL. You gentlemen have been saying to us two or three years that you wanted this Government to go out of the banking business. I want to say to you that this morning you are inveigling it into the banking business, to fill your banks with free currency, so that they can loan it to the people at these exorbitant rates. We say, sir, that this Government ought to say, "We will coin all the gold and all the silver that can come to the mints until there is enough money to make the exchanges, and if there is not enough we will issue full legal-tender United States notes, redeemable only when the coin supply is sufficient to redeem them without contracting the currency."

Mr. HILL. That is precisely what I understood the gentleman's position to be.

Mr. BELL. Yes; that is my position.

Mr. HILL. Will you now kindly go on and explain how the Government is going to get that money out into circulation?

Mr. BELL. Oh, there is no trouble about the Government getting it into circulation. The Government has gotten its money into circulation from the outset of its affairs by paying it out on its obligations. When Thomas Jefferson attempted to issue Treasury notes you gentlemen in the banking business said that if he did not make the interest high they could not be circulated, but finally $25,000,000 of them got out into hands of the people with only 1 mill interest per annum, or no interest at all, and the banks boycotted them, and we had to impose a penalty against using them before we could get them away from the people. There is no trouble about getting the money into circulation with our increasing obligations.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wonder that these gentlemen who study this question under the influences of banking profits can state that it is only the bank that can enable the country to do business. Now, suppose the banks should all burst; what on earth would become of the American people? Would it not be too bad if the people of the United States could not find some way to do their business without these banks? Now, if you are going to have a bank—and I am in favor of banks—I am not opposed to our having national banks. I am in favor of national banks; but I want to say to you that I would say to the national banks that they shall buy currency in the same way as any individual or a State bank buys its currency, and I would put these banks out of the governing business and would say to the national banks that are interested in issuing currency, "This is a Government function, and you shall not mix your private interests with the Government business of issuing currency."

Now, I understand, and I have seen it in print, that one of the Adamses, when he came to this House, owned some national-bank stock, and did not believe that he was even entitled to a seat in this House, owning bank stock, because he thought that was against a healthy public policy.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You mean United States Bank stock?

Mr. BELL. Yes; United States Bank stock; because he thought that his private business would conflict with his public duty, and that the public would not approve it. If things so continue, the banks will control everything and monopolize everything. They can make things prosperous in twenty-four hours and bring destruction to every industry in this country in twenty-four hours.

Mr. Garfield, when statesmanship in this country counted for something, said:

Show me a set of men who control the currency, and I will show you a set of men who control the destiny of the country.

Now, that is just as true to-day as it was yesterday or at any former time. When the original discussion between Mr. Calhoun and others was going on, they said that "if the banks could control the currency of the country, they could organize, and whenever they wanted to buy property they could make money scarce and buy it low; that when they wanted to sell property, by harmonious action they could make money abundant and make it high, and in time they could get all the wealth of the country into their end of the box." Now, there is no doubt about that, and for that reason we are opposed to the financial bill; and I hope the minority will ever be in favor of real honest money, and that the money question will never be considered settled until the Government of the United States shall control all the money of this great country for the equal benefit of all the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield six minutes, the remaining time, to my colleague.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has returned to his seat, for I desire to take up his challenge given me when he delivered his speech in this House last Saturday. He said, refusing to be interrupted by me:

If my statements of fact are incorrect, any gentleman can correct me.

I shall now do so, and I challenge him or anyone here or elsewhere to successfully refute either the facts I shall state or discredit the authorities I quote. Amongst other things, the honorable gentleman said:

(1) Coin was put in opposition to paper, and the promise was given that they should not be paid in paper, but should be paid in coin, and coin from 1862 down to 1878 was understood to mean gold. (2) All the discussions in Congress on the issue of greenbacks show that the word "coin" was used generally interchangeably with the word "gold" on the part of everybody discussing the question.

That "coin was put in in opposition to paper" I agree. That "coin" was put in in opposition to silver I wholly dispute, because the facts—what has actually been done by Congress, and what Congress has positively refused to do, and the opinions of the Supreme Court on the several acts of Congress passed between "1862 and 1878"—each and all clearly show I am correct; that is, that "coin" does not mean gold only or silver only.

This Government never issued a bond payable on its face or back in gold only. Previous to 1869 our civil-war bonds were payable in "lawful money"—that is, in legal-tender paper and coin. In 1869 Congress made them payable in coin—that is, in gold and silver, or either, at the option of the Government, and not at the option of the creditor.

"From 1862 to 1878" coin meant, as now, gold and silver or either, at the option of the Government, and I deny that it was "understood" between these years or at any time that the word "coin" meant gold only. I deny that the discussions in Congress show that the word "coin" was an interchangeable term with or meant gold only. I deny our "duties" were collected or collectible in gold only, though the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] disputes this. I shall treat these propositions collectively, as my time is brief.

In 1869 the Senate, by a vote of 8 to 34, refused to make our bonds payable in gold only.

The amendment read as follows:

That it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to an early resumption of specie payments by the Government in order that conflicting questions touching the mode of discharging the public indebtedness may be settled and that the same may be paid in gold.

The vote was as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Cole, Davis, Henderson, Morton, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Spencer—8.

Nays—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Warner, Welch, Wiley, Williams, Wilson—34.

If in 1869 coin meant gold only, why this amendment? Why this overwhelming defeat? And why did the same Congress at a later day turn our bonds from lawful money into "coin" bonds; and in so doing why did they use the term "coin," and not gold?

Then, at the very time we turned our war bonds from lawful money—paper and coin—into coin the Senate refused, by a vote of 8 to 34, to insert the word "gold" in the place of lawful money or coin, and yet this distinguished gentleman says all the discussions in Congress show that the word "coin" was used as generally interchangeable with the word "gold;" that coin meant gold only.

Again, between the years "1862 and 1878" the Supreme Court of the United States, in a clear and unanimous opinion, held that—

These bonds were engagements to pay dollars, and the dollars intended are coin dollars of the United States, of gold or silver of a certain weight and fineness.

I read from the case Bank vs. Supervisors, found in 7 Wallace page 30, decided in 1868, between "1862 to 1878," as follows:

But on the other hand, it is equally clear that these notes are obligations of the United States. Their name imports obligation. Every one of them expresses on its face an engagement of the nation to pay to the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coin dollar of the United States—a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government. No other dollars had before been recognized by the legislation of the National Government as lawful money.

[Applause.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] is a lawyer and has been since "April 19, 1847." He can fully appreciate the force of this great court's opinion—as fully as anyone—but he has simply overlooked it.

Note well, Mr. Speaker, the court uses the term "dollars" and not "dollar," the plural and not singular, clearly showing that we had two kinds of "dollars," gold and silver, and that "dollar" meant both or either. The court had previously said in the same case:

These notes [United States notes], made payable on demand and receivable for all public dues, including duties on imports, always payable in coin—

Not gold only, you see—

were practically equivalent to coin; and all public disbursements, until after date of the act last mentioned [February 12, 1862], were made in coin or these notes.

Here the court says these notes were "equivalent to coin," and that coin, as here used, was the equivalent of our gold or silver dollar. In this 7th Wallace case the court reviewed the acts of July 17, 1861, August 5, 1861, February 12, 1862, February 25, 1862, July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

So that my distinguished friend must yield his position that Congress or the courts at any time, I may add, treated coin as gold only; for here the Supreme Court, reviewing the acts of Congress, finds and decides that my position is correct and he is in error.

Again, he says that our tariff duties were collected in coin and that the coin collected was gold only, and so collected to pay these bonds. In this he is in error.

In the case of Cheang Kee vs. United States, decided in 1865, between 1862 and 1878, reported in 3 Wallace, at page 326, in a unanimous opinion, the Supreme Court of the United States, affirming the lower court, held that our duties were payable in "gold and silver." The lower court at first entered a judgment for gold coin only, but (at the same time of court rightfully) changed the judgment and made it payable "in gold and silver coin of the United States, with the costs of this action."

The Chief Justice, speaking for the whole court, said:

The whole case shows that the judgment was for duties on imports, and nothing but gold and silver coin—

Not gold coin only, you see—has been made a legal tender for this description of indebtedness to the Government. Affirmed with cost.

In 1865—between "1862 and 1878." Here, at least, is one case where the duty was collected in silver, whether in fact so collected or not.

This case has been reaffirmed by the same court.

Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania is again mistaken when he says that our duties were collected in gold coin only, or that they were payable in gold coin only, or that coin means gold only, for, although the statute which the gentleman quotes required that our duties should be collected in "coin," the Supreme Court in this case expressly held that the word "coin" means gold and silver coin. [Applause.]

But at that time and long after gold was cheaper than silver and it was easier for the importer to pay in the cheaper coin, gold, than in silver, and if the distinguished gentleman, who was a member of this House from 1850 to March, 1863, voted to pay our bonds in gold, in the language of to-day he was then a repudiator, because he forced the creditor to take the "cheaper" coin, gold, in payment of his obligations, which cost him, says Senator Morton, on an average of 60 cents, some as low as 36 cents [applause]; or if he voted for a law making the importer pay his duties in gold coin only, he forced upon the Government the cheaper coin, gold, when he could have made him pay silver or both. If he did not vote for the law, he now upholds and commends it.

The honorable gentleman was Speaker of this House from 1861 to March 4, 1863. By an act of Congress of February 25, 1862, our duties were made payable in "coin." He quotes this act in his speech. He as Speaker approved it. If "coin" meant gold only, why did he not say so in this law? It had meant silver before 1862; why not thereafter? He is a man of plain words. The Congress could have said gold as easily as coin, but failed, and repeatedly refused—in 1869, 1878, 1895, 1897—to insert gold in any of our public obligations.

In further evidence that the word "coin" was not treated by Congress between 1862 and 1878 as gold only I beg to read a letter containing the sentiments often expressed in Congress between "1862 and 1878" by the Hon. Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio. He said:

VICE-PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER,
Washington, December 13, 1867.

Yours of the 8th instant is received, and I must cordially agree with every word and sentence of it. I am for the laboring portion of our people. The rich can take care of themselves. While I must scrupulously live up to all the contracts of the Government and fight repudiation to the death, I will fight the bondholder as resolutely when he undertakes to get more than the pound of flesh. We never agreed to pay the 5-20's in gold; no man can find it in the bond, and I never will consent to have one payment for the people. It would sink any party, and it ought to. To talk of specie payments or a return to specie under present circumstances is to talk like a fool. It would destroy the country as effectually as a fire. And any contraction of the currency at this time is about as bad. But I have not time to give my ideas in full.

Yours, truly,

BENJAMIN F. WADE.

The interest on our five-twenties was payable in "coin." The bondholders wanted the principal and interest made payable in gold. This fight caused Senator Wade to thus speak in 1868:

If I knew that any party in this country would go for paying in coin that which is payable in money, thus enhancing it one-half—if I knew there was such a platform and such a determination this day on the part of any party, I would vote for the other side, Frank Blair and all. I would vote for no such swindle upon the taxpayers of this country. I would vote for no such speculation in favor of the large bondholders, the millionaires who took advantage of our folly in granting them coin payment of interest.

The fact is, Congress refused to make either principal or interest payable in gold only.

In 1869 Senator Garrett Davis offered the following amendment:

That the just and equitable measure of the obligations of the United States upon their outstanding bonds is the value in gold and silver coin of the paper currency advanced and paid to the Government on these bonds.

He did not say the proper measure would be the value in gold coin, but gold and silver.

Changing our bond contract from lawful money to coin was hard enough. It gave, as by slight of hand, to the bondholder $484,141,180, but to have changed it to one coin, gold, or to silver, and not to coin, as we did, would have been still worse.

In 1868, Senator Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, said:

We would do foul injustice to the Government and to the people of the United States, after we sold those bonds on an average for not more than 60 cents on the dollar, now to propose to make a new contract for the benefit of the bondholder.

Yet the change was more, the sacrifice was surmounted, but we fail anywhere to find in the Congressional debates, or opinions of the Supreme Court, declaring that "coin" from 1862 to 1878 meant gold only. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I find in looking over the resolution that it says, "So much as relates to quarantine regulations and foreign immigration be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization."

That resolution follows precisely the resolution passed two years ago; but on looking further I find that that was a mistake. I do not think that what relates to quarantine regulations should go to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, but to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; therefore I move to strike out, in line 3, page 4, the words "quarantine regulations and;" so that it will read: "and so much as relates to foreign immigration shall be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, to what committee does the gentleman say the quarantine regulations should be referred?

The SPEAKER. To the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand this was inadvertently changed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know how it was changed; but I understand the resolution so provided that was adopted at the last Congress. I am satisfied it was a mistake, and that the quarantine regulations do not belong to the Committee on Naturalization. I understand from the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee that they took jurisdiction notwithstanding the resolution was in the form that it was.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, and the committee had many days of hearing, and no one apparently recognized the mistake that had been made. The procedure was as in the olden time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentlemen and committee proceeded without authority.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; but we had ample authority under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was again read.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

DESIGNATION OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts on House resolution 33.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 33, authorizing and directing said committee to designate the committees of the House to which the clerks provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, should be allowed and assigned for the present Congress, and to report by resolution to the House for its action thereon, respectfully report that they have examined into and considered said matter, and report to the House and recommend the passage of the accompanying resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the eighteen clerks to committees of the House during the session provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, be, and they are hereby, allowed and assigned for the present Congress to the following committees, namely:

- To the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Education, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Enrolled Bills, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, an assistant clerk.
- To the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Labor, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Library, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Militia, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Mines and Mining, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Insular Affairs, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Patents, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Pensions, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Private Land Claims, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Printing, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Railways and Canals, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, a clerk.
- To the Committee on Territories, a clerk.

And resolved, That the pay of the clerks to committees of the House of Representatives, which have been or may be hereafter authorized by the House, who are paid during the session only, shall begin from the time such clerks entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of the several committees employing clerks for the session only.

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BULL, a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

DEATH OF SENATOR-ELECT HAYWARD.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay before the House the following resolutions passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. MONROE L. HAYWARD, lately elected Senator from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, later in the session the delegation from Nebraska in this House will ask that time be set apart for the purpose of paying fitting tribute to the memory of the lately elected Senator HAYWARD. For present purposes I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. MONROE L. HAYWARD, lately elected a Senator from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions. The resolutions were agreed to.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the United States Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways, with a report on the regulation of the level of Lake Erie—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the Willamette River at Willamette Falls, Clackamas County, Oreg.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of deficiencies in appropriations for the Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2913) removing the charge of desertion from the military record of William Lehman—Committee on War Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 3090) to correct the military record of Henry Finnegans—Committee on War Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RYAN of New York: A bill (H. R. 4718) to regulate the collection and disbursement of moneys arising from leases made by the Seneca Nation of New York Indians, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FLYNN: A bill (H. R. 4719) providing for the appointment of registers of deeds in the Indian Territory—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. BELLAMY: A bill (H. R. 4720) to provide for a macadamized approach and roadway to the national cemetery at Wilmington, N. C.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SIBLEY: A bill (H. R. 4721) to fix the rate of pension of sailors and soldiers in certain cases—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BELLAMY: A bill (H. R. 4722) to provide for the improvement of Shallatte River, Brunswick County, N. C.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. LACEY: A bill (H. R. 4723) providing for the compulsory attendance of witnesses before registers and receivers of the land office—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. JONES of Washington: A bill (H. R. 4734) to declare the true intent and meaning of portions of "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1898—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama (for Mr. WHEELER of Alabama): A bill (H. R. 4725) to require the first sergeant of each company of the Army of the United States to call the names of soldiers killed in battle—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JENKINS: A bill (H. R. 4726) relating to the holding of courts of the United States in the western district of Wisconsin—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BABCOCK: A bill (H. R. 4727) amendatory of sections 3339 and 3341 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to internal-revenue tax on fermented liquors—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DAYTON: A bill (H. R. 4728) providing for leaves of absence to certain employees of the Government—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BROSIUS (by request): A bill (H. R. 4729) to establish the Fredericksburg and Adjacent National Battlefields Memorial Park in the State of Virginia—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 4730) to grant land to the State of Florida for the use of the normal college for white pupils at De Funiak Springs and for the use of the normal college at Tallahassee for colored pupils—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4731) to authorize the establishment of a fish-cultural and biological station on the Gulf of Mexico within the limits of the State of Florida—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4732) making an appropriation for the purpose of constructing a sidewalk in front of the public building at Pensacola, Fla.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4733) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish States, for use of normal colleges, one set of standard weights and measures—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. LEVY: A bill (H. R. 4734) to amend section 5153 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1899.

Prayer by Rev. LUCIEN CLARK, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

AGREEMENT WITH SEMINOLE INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of an agreement made by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes in behalf of the United States with a commission duly appointed on the part of the Seminole tribe of Indians, in the Indian Territory, fixing a time after which no person shall be enrolled as a Seminole citizen, and providing for the distribution of the estates of the deceased Seminole citizens after December 31, 1899; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Select Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and ordered to be printed.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; which was read:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION, Washington, December 20, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to present the form of a joint resolution to fill the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than members of Congress, occasioned by the death on July 16 last of the late Dr. William Preston Johnston, of Louisiana, and to respectfully state that so far as I have been able to learn the opinions of the Regents the vacancy in the board would be to them most acceptably filled by the appointment of Richard Olney, a resident of Massachusetts, as provided for in the draft inclosed.

This appointment would be conformable to section 5580 of the Revised Statutes (a copy of which is inclosed), which requires that four of the members of the Board of Regents "shall be inhabitants of some State, but no two of them of the same State."

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

S. P. LANGLEY, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,

President pro tempore of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication transmits to the Senate a joint resolution. The Chair is informed that it is usual to have the joint resolution read twice and receive consideration by the unanimous consent of the Senate without reference to any committee.

Mr. HOAR. From what source does the communication come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that it ever has occurred in the history of the Senate or the Institution that the regents undertook to propose to the Senate or the House how they should act in the duty imposed upon them by law in the selection of those regents. It is the first time. It is a very extraordinary communication, indeed. I am astonished that such a communication should have been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair informs the Senator that Professor Langley stated that it was the usual course of the Institution.

Mr. HOAR. I am constrained to express a different opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What does the Senator propose with reference to the communication?

Mr. HOAR. Let it go on the table.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask what is the question before the Senate? I just came in, at this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a communication from the Smithsonian Institution as to a regent to be appointed in the place of one who has died.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that it would be as proper for the judges of the Supreme Court to address to the President a suggestion as to the nomination of one of their associates or to the Senate a suggestion as to his confirmation. There is no difference between the selection of this class of officers and any other class of officers provided by statute. I think the communication is an entire inadvertence. I have the highest respect for the gentleman whose name is signed to the communication. No man can have higher respect than I have for his personal and his public character as a scientific man. But I am sure that a communication like this is without precedent.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the communication, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It relates to the appointment of a regent in the place of one who is deceased.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I wish to say only one word in reference to the matter. I think the communication is perhaps a little unusual. The usual manner of dealing with such a question, I think, has been that the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution has conferred—and I am sure, as a matter of fact, that for several years the Secretary has conferred in the time of our distinguished friend, Senator Morrill—as to a good man to be put upon the board.

Mr. HOAR. At Mr. Morrill's invitation.

Mr. CULLOM. At Mr. Morrill's invitation; largely so. The Secretary has generally come here and conferred with him about it, and, I suppose, without any desire at all to dictate to the Senate or to Congress, the Secretary has made this communication to the President of the Senate. I am very certain that Professor Langley has no disposition whatever to interfere with the free exercise of the right of the Senate in the selection, whoever might be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suggest to what committee it should be referred?

Mr. CULLOM. There is no committee that really has charge of the matter. I think communications of that sort should go to the Committee on the Library or the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I came into the Senate while this discussion was going on, and did not hear the communication read. I would ask, if it be agreeable to other Senators, that the joint resolution, which is communicated in the Secretary's letter, may lie on the table for the present.

Mr. CULLOM. That will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the communication will lie on the table, and the accompanying joint resolution with it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut subsequently said: I ask that the communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, which was laid on the table at my request, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the communication from the Smithsonian Institution be taken from the table and, with the accompanying joint resolution, be referred to the Committee on the Library. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 4152) to extend the time for examination of monthly accounts by bureaus and offices of the War Department, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a petition of the Christian Endeavor Union of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the adoption of an antipolygamy constitutional amendment; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Adrian, Mich., and a petition of sundry American missionaries resident in Bulgaria and Turkey, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry American missionaries resident in Bulgaria and Turkey, praying for the enactment of legislation to suppress gambling and bookmaking in connection with racing in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CARTER presented the petition of George W. Jenkins and sundry other citizens of Helena and Jefferson City, Mont., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of the Stock Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend and correct the war-revenue law relating to the tax on stocks, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of 54 citizens of Philadelphia, 50 citizens of Ulster, 5 citizens of York, 18 citizens of Port Allegheny, 34 citizens of Allegheny, 101 citizens of Montoursville, 66 citizens of Reading, 18 citizens of Washington County, 12 citizens of Meadville, 42 citizens of Deckhaven, 19 citizens of Carlisle, 7 citizens of Spring Church, 16 citizens of Wattsburg, of the congregation of the Mount Carmel Reformed Church, and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Mount Carmel, of sundry members of the Sanitary League of Philadelphia, of 65 citizens of Verona, of 138 citizens of Linesville, of the Young Men's Christian Association of Wilkesbarre, of the general missionary committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Carlisle, of the congregations of sundry churches of Titusville, and of the northern conference of the Pittsburg Lutheran Synod, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying that in the construction of the new dry dock at Mare Island, Cal., concrete and stone be used instead of timber; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Los Angeles, Cal., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty with Jamaica; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation granting the Commercial Cable Company of Cuba the right to lay and operate a cable from the United States to Cuba; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., praying that all nursery stock imported into the United States shall be free from insect pests and disease, and that all fruits infested with insect pests shall be quarantined and not allowed to enter the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LINDSAY presented the petition of C. L. Bradley and 17 other citizens of Ivins Store and Waterloo, in the State of Kentucky, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of the Farmers' National Congress, praying for a continuance of the appropriation providing for rural free mail delivery; for the enactment of legislation providing that no dairy or food product shall be falsely branded or labeled; for the extermination of the ravages of the gypsy moth; to prevent discrimination in freight rates against the producer and shipper of agricultural products; to extend such aid to American-built vessels as will enable them to successfully cope with foreign shippers in our marine traffic; that all products known as oleomargarine, butterine, etc., shall, upon arrival, become subject to the laws of such State or Territory; to increase the internal-revenue tax on oleomargarine to 10 cents per pound, etc.; and remonstrating against the appropriation of money by the Government to be expended for repairs and water storage to be applied to agricultural lands not previously cultivated; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petitions of L. Dennis and 27 other citizens of Milo, John Shadle and 34 other citizens of Sioux City, F. M. Beal and 37 other citizens of Shannon, and of T. F. Stauffer and 147 citizens of Sioux City, all in the State of Iowa, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of the Latin-American Club and Foreign Trade Association of St. Louis, Mo., praying Congress to subsidize vessels sailing under the flag of the United States, in order to build up a merchant marine and to facilitate the export trade. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also present supplementary resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens, held under the auspices of the Public Ownership Democratic League of St. Louis, December 2, 1899, reciting what the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, colonial secretary of Great Britain, had announced in regard to an alliance between Great Britain and the United States, and denouncing that and any proposition for an alliance with Great Britain. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE presented the petitions of W. Fred Wilson and 44 other citizens of North Abington, Rev. Charlton B. Bolles and 18 other citizens of Rockport, and of Carey W. Chamberlin and sundry other citizens of Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MCCOMAS presented petitions of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Elkton, of W. R. Henner and 99 other citizens of Friendsville, of the congregation of St. Paul's Evangelical Lutheran Church of Baltimore, of Susan A. Spriggs and sundry other citizens of Baltimore, Edward F. Stands and 13 other citizens of Baltimore, Charles L. Pate and 18 other citizens of Baltimore, Henry M. Earp and 18 other citizens of Govanstown, James W. Campbell and 18 other citizens of Baltimore County, William C. Vogts and 41 other citizens of Fork, George W. Taylor and sundry other citizens of Zion, and of Fannie E. Pridham and sundry other citizens of Baltimore, all in the State of Maryland, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Committee on Relations with Cuba to the following communication. I ask the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine desire to have the paper sent to the desk read?

Mr. HALE. Yes; let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

HABANA, December 19.

General Brooke will issue to-morrow the following proclamation:

"By direction of the President, I hereby transfer to my successor, Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, the duties and responsibilities of the office of military governor, bespeaking for him that support and confidence which you have come to accord me. To those who have been associated with me in the performance of the difficult task of reorganizing and placing in operation the civil government of the island I hereby tender this expression of appreciation and thanks for their loyal and patriotic support and assistance.

"A year ago I found the country most thoroughly devastated, its resources and commerce destroyed, and its rural population gathered into towns, without food and without shelter, and dying of starvation and exposure. The Government of the United States immediately supplied work and food.

"In a short time this condition passed away, and now the country is rapidly pressing forward to a prosperity hitherto unknown in its history.

"Look about and see how true this is. The various steps that have led to the present condition are well known to you and need not be mentioned here. The change is truly marvelous. Without the semblance of civil government then, you have now a complete organization. Your municipal and provincial governments are all in the hands of your own citizens. The military control is purely advisory and supervisory. Many of your laws have been modified and changed to suit the times in which you live as well as interests of good government. Your courts have been reorganized and are in operation. Peace reigns. Law and order rule.

"By your own industry and by a careful observance of these conditions the full restoration of your social affairs and prosperity is assured. With the feeling that the future is in your hands, to make or to mar, and trusting that wise counsels may prevail among you, I say to you farewell."

General Wood's arrival is looked for to-morrow morning, etc.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I thought of introducing a resolution based upon this communication, to be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba, but did not deem that necessary, as the reading of General Brooke's proclamation must arrest the attention of the Senate, of the committee, and of the country. It is a most remarkable statement of the progress that has been made in Cuba in bringing about peace and order and a condition where the people, if General Brooke be right, must be ready at some near date to enter upon a government of their own.

General Brooke is to be congratulated upon accomplishing, with the assistance of his subordinates, so vast a work. It is more, Mr. President, than I supposed had been done in Cuba. I see in the light of this communication a nearer dawn of free government in Cuba, a government of the people there set up in their own way, a sister republic, undoubtedly, near to our doors, than I had been able to see before.

I do not know whether the Committee on Relations with Cuba propose any action during the recess, but I know that the chairman and other members of the committee will take notice of this much to be rejoiced at condition in Cuba and in the consideration of the subject, which they will soon take up, they will be sure that it has its full share in their deliberations.

I suppose General Brooke, having been displaced, may come north and be here in the United States. If he comes, I for one shall certainly be glad to hear personally what he has to say, and I have no doubt the committee will have the same desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine ask to have any reference made of the paper?

Mr. HALE. It will go naturally to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

REMOVAL OF SEAT OF GOVERNMENT TO WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit two brief papers relating to the removal of the seat of government to the District of Columbia and ask that they be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1481) appropriating money to reimburse Capt. B. Tellefsen, reported it without amendment; which, together with the accompanying message from the President of the United States transmitting a report from the Secretary of State relating to the claim of Capt. B. Tellefsen, of the Norwegian steamer Albert, was placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 197) for the relief of Hattie A. Phillips, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 198) to reimburse the State of Wyoming for money expended by the Territory of Wyoming in protecting and preserving the Yellowstone National Park during the years 1884, 1885, and 1886, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1893) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to complete the public building at Cheyenne, Wyo., reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 746) to authorize C. R. Dobbins to accept a gold watch awarded to him by the Government of the Dominion of Canada in recognition of his humane and gallant services to the shipwrecked crew of the British schooner Ashton, of Weymouth, Nova Scotia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1740) to authorize C. E. Marr and E. H. Pierce to accept silver watches awarded to them by the Government of the Dominion of Canada in recognition of their services in rescuing British sailors, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 707) for the relief of Charles T. Rader, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 602) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States and acts amendatory thereof, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 641) to repeal certain provisions in an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1897, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

CAPT. N. M. BROOKS.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 16) to authorize Capt. N. M. Brooks, Superintendent of Foreign Mails, Post-Office Department, to accept decorations from the Governments of Liberia and Venezuela, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF CRIMINAL AND PENAL LAWS.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 14th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 copies of the report of the Commission for the Revision of the Criminal and Penal Laws of the United States, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably resolution No. 35 and to ask for its present consideration.

The resolution submitted by Mr. FRYE on the 18th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the resolution should not be confined to bills, but also other subjects before the committee. There are, or are likely to be, a good many resolves sent by the Senate. I know of one which is likely to be sent to that committee before long, and the resolution should read, "Such hearings as may be had on bills or other subjects pending before said committee."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to the resolution being so amended. I believe it was drafted by the chairman of the committee, and I presumed it was correct.

Mr. HOAR. I make the suggestion because I have in mind a subject, in regard to which the Committee on Commerce may likely send for persons and papers, which I expect to bring before them soon, and it will not be in the form of a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 18th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the arguments before the Committee on Privileges and Elections concerning the right of Matthew S. Quay to a seat in the Senate from the State of Pennsylvania be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

MARBLE PEDESTAL FOR BUST OF SUMNER.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 19th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be directed to procure a suitable marble pedestal for the bust of Charles Sumner near the entrance to the Senators' gallery, and that the sum of $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated therefor from the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1932) to provide for the relinquishment by the Turtle Mountain band of the Pembina Chippewa Indians of their unceded lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 1933) to provide an American register for the steam whaler Bowhead; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1934) for the relief of the Globe Works, of Boston, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1935) for the relief of the Globe Works, of Boston, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 1936) granting a pension to Mamie Craig Lawton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 1937) to provide leaves of absence to certain employees of the Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 1938) to place Henry Biederbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell on the retired list of enlisted men of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 1939) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission to study and make full report upon the commercial and industrial conditions of China and Japan, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1940) to prevent discrimination between various kinds of legal-tender money of the United States, and to maintain the equal debt-paying and purchasing power thereof, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TURNER introduced a bill (S. 1941) for the relief of the Lower band of the Chinook Indians of the State of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 1942) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated and to provide for the payment of all claims for the use and occupation of church and school buildings and grounds for Government purposes by the United States military authorities during the late war, and all claims for damages resulting from the appropriation to Government use of any of the furnishings or materials in said class of buildings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1943) for the relief of the Methodist Protestant Church; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HARRIS was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, and by unanimous consent, Mr. ALLEN was appointed to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, the Committee on Interstate Commerce, the Committee on the Philippines, and the Committee on Pensions.

POLICY REGARDING NEW POSSESSIONS.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit an amendment to Senate joint resolution No. 45, and ask that it be read and printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the resolving clause in the joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. BACON on the 18th instant, and insert:

That in pursuance of section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution, the United States will guarantee to the people of Puerto Rico, Hawaii, the Philippine Islands, and all other States and peoples within its sovereign jurisdiction and control, a republican form of government, and will protect them against invasion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that the amendment may be printed and lie on the table subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DICEY BOBBITT.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill (S. 489) for the relief of Dicey Bobbitt, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions December 6, 1899, be recalled; that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from its further consideration, and then, when it is brought before the Senate, that it be indefinitely postponed, as the claimant is dead.
